SENATOR FLETCHER ON TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very timely and interesting article by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] appearing in the New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin of the 3d instant entitled "Tax-exempt issues should be allowed. Proposal for constitutional amendment unsound." I ask that it be printed in 8-point type—the regular type of the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin, Tuesday, Jan. 3, 1922.]

TAX-EXEMPT ISSUES SHOULD BE ALLOWED—PROPOSAL FOR CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT UNSOUND—ARGUMENTS FOR ABOLITION OF PRIVILEGES OF STATES AND MUNICIPALITIES DO NOT EQUAL REASONS FOR THEIR MAINTENANCE.

(By Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, of Florida, member Senate Committee on Banking and Currency.)

Proposal is made to amend the Constitution of the United States in order that holders of securities issued free from taxation in pursuance of State and municipal laws may be required to pay taxes on the income derived from such securities to the Federal Government.

The proposal is based on the claim that capital in large amounts seeks such securities in order to escape taxation, thus depriving industry of the benefits of financial support which would otherwise be furnished, and at the same time enabling large investors and capitalists to escape taxation, thereby denying to the Government the revenue they should contribute.

If these assertions were true, the case would be practically closed in favor of the proposed amendment.

But the arguments offered are challenged for the following reasons:

1. There is no proof that exempt securities outside of United States bonds are held in large amounts by men of large incomes. And who can say with certainty that investment by this class of investors—in United States bonds—is inspired more by a desire to escape taxation than by patriotic motives and safety.

2. Such amendment can not affect outstanding tax-exempt securities and therefore no increase of Federal revenue can come from outstanding issues.

3. The amendment would deprive States and municipalities from procuring future funds at a low rate of interest, and thus prevent development and progress in the way of essential public improvements.

4. The class of funds which go into tax-exempt securities comes largely from estate and trust funds, for the benefit of widows and orphans, by reason of the fact that the element of speculation (consequent from high interest rates) must be eliminated from such securities, the safety of the principal being the first requisite.

Again, capitalists will not, simply to escape a reasonable income tax, invest in securities paying from 4½ to 6 per cent when they are able to make many times this per cent by investing in some business or enterprise.

The income taxes now levied are not high for ordinary incomes and are more likely to be reduced than increased.

GREATER YIELDS AVAILABLE.

There are numerous, almost numberless, industrial, commercial, and business opportunities where the earnings will yield 10 per cent, with a possibility of 20 per cent, and the capitalist will not forego such undertakings merely for the certainty of 5 or 6 per cent.

Without questioning the dislike for taxes and the quite general desire to escape all kinds of taxation, placing the matter on the footing of self-interest, the capitalist generally looks for greater earnings and does not tie up his capital in low interest bearing securities, even though they are tax free.

Reference to the debates on the revenue law of this year, where actual incomes are stated—and if it were possible to obtain access to the records in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue additional proofs could be had—show that a 5 or 6 per cent investment offers no inducement to those enjoying the dividends and profits arising from certain business ventures.

Take any financial journal and note the quotations on bank stock, bonds of foreign Governments, railroads, industrials, public utilities, stocks in certain corporations, to say nothing of investments not quoted, compare the total indebtedness, yielding income in the way of interest, with the amount invested in tax-exempt securities, and you find an answer to the argument that there is danger that a large portion of the money in the country is rapidly finding its way into nontaxable securities. The percentage is practically negligible.

Official figures of tax-exempt United States bonds and notes, of bonds issued by Federal and joint-stock land banks, of bonds issued by our insular possessions, also the census figures of State and municipal bonds, may be stated as follows:

Gross and net amounts of tax-exempt securities outstanding.

Date.	Gross amount outstanding.	Held by the Treasury.	Net amount outstanding.
Sept. 30—Prewar debt	$883,784,050	$742,570,890	$141,213,160
Sept. 30—3½ Liberty bonds	1,410,074,050	1,362,650	1,408,711,400
Sept. 30—3¾ Victory notes	557,251,600	196,000	557,055,600
Sept. 30—War savings securities	671,461,557	.....	671,461,557
Total Federal bonds	3,522,571,257	744,129,540	2,778,441,717
Oct. 31—Federal land-bank bonds	420,763,315	183,000,000	237,763,315
Oct. 31—Joint-stock land-bank bonds	77,705,000	.....	77,705,000
Philippine, Hawaiian, and Porto Rican bonds	70,000,000	5,458,000	64,542,000
State bonds, 1919	744,382,933	.....	744,382,933
City bonds, issued by cities with population of 30,000 and over, 1919	3,904,353,844	.....	3,904,353,844
Bonds issued by counties, cities, and all other civil divisions, 1913	6,600,000,000	.....	6,600,000,000

Exclusive of the Federal bonds, the securities mentioned are issued for the purpose of accomplishing some important public improvement or development or for productive purposes.

COUNTY FINANCING.

For instance, a county, after a vote of the people authorizing it, issues bonds in order to raise the money necessary to construct public roads. It is important that the bonds bear a low rate of interest and that they be sold at par, a small commission being charged by the broker marketing them. If the income derived from them is to be taxed, there will be difficulty in selling them, the interest rate will have to be increased, and the commission on their sale will be greater, or they must sell below par, thus indirectly increasing the rate of interest.

The investor who takes them really contributes to the public welfare as much by taking them at the low rate of interest as he would by taking them at a discount or at a higher rate and paying the Federal Government a tax on the income derived from them. The public derives the benefit of the tax-exempt feature rather than the investor. Without this feature it would not be possible to build roads, reclaim lands, construct water works and make public improvements where needed and most desirable, all of which is now being done from the proceeds of such bonds.

In many instances States will find it very difficult, if not impossible, to obtain their proportion of the $75,000,000 now available under the recent Federal highway act if the bonds issued to raise the funds necessary to match the Federal aid were not exempt from Federal taxes.

FEDERAL LAND BANK BONDS.

The argument against tax exemption will be applied to the Federal land bank bonds, which are now exempt from all taxation, the proceeds of which are loaned to actual farmers producing the Nation's food. If the purchaser should be obliged to pay an income tax on them it would be necessary, in order to sell them at par—and it is inconceivable that they should ever be sold at less—to increase the rate of interest, which would mean the farmer would have to pay this increase. Take away the tax exemption and you will have to remove the maximum interest charge of 6 per cent to borrowers now fixed by the farm loan act. Exorbitant interest charges and time prices have cursed the farmers of this country in the past. No other industry could have borne such burdens and survived. There can be no general prosperity unless and until the farmer prospers. We have a system provided by the farm loan act under which the farmers of the country are obtaining some financial accommodations on terms and rates they can meet. We want to improve and enlarge these accommodations. The bonds bear 5 per cent and sell at par. Five hundred million dollars have been furnished the farmers of the country under that system. If these bonds shall be taxed, or the income from them, it is inevitable that the borrowing farmer must pay it, which he can not do and prosper from the very nature of the business. The rate of interest on the bonds will have to be raised, and to that extent the interest the farmer must pay will be increased. The borrowers should pay not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent more than the bonds bear.

Private interests wish this done for reasons there is not space to discuss here. They always opposed the requirement in the farm loan act that these bonds should be exempt from all taxation.

Their opposition has led up to, if, indeed, it did not originate, this idea of taxing all securities.

I am unalterably opposed to disturbing this tax-exempt feature of farm loan bonds as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court.

Even now the Farm Loan Board claims that the public will not absorb more than $150,000,000 annually of these bonds. That sum does not half supply the demands of the farmers of the country. Another proof that capital is not overdoing it in looking for tax-free securities.

We sorely need more investors, more money to take more of these nontaxable bonds. Let it come. Why discourage it?

EFFECT ON LOCAL TAXES.

To do away with tax-exempt securities as proposed means an increase in interest rates and consequently increase in taxation by State and local governments to meet additional interest charges, or else the abandonment of public improvements under local authority and the discontinuance of progress in the betterment of social life.

Even if the proposed amendment should receive the required vote of Congress, I do not believe a sufficient number of States would ever ratify it.

As the ability to tax is the ability to destroy, States and municipalities are not likely to accord to the Federal Government the right to throw obstacles in the way of the procurement of capital which they consider sufficiently essential to their own prosperity as to exempt it from taxation. They will reasonably contend that local opinion should govern as to their own requirements and that the present is a wise provision of the Constitution which prohibits such interference by the Federal Government and restrains it in the grasp for additional power.

The considerations herein mentioned may well cause us to emphasize the caution contained in the President's address to Congress of December 6, 1921, to wit:

> Such a change in the Constitution must be very thoroughly considered before submission. There ought to be known what influence it will have on the inevitable refunding of our vast national debt, how it will operate on the necessary refunding of State and municipal debt, how the advantages of Nation over State and municipality, or the contrary, may be avoided.

Is it possible that international bankers would like to remove these tax-free securities from competition with the enormous offerings of foreign bonds they handle?

There is almost scandalous propaganda to induce the cancellation of debts due the United States by countries, some of which are claimed to be bankrupt, but these bankers do not hesitate to unload on the American public the bonds of these so-called insolvent countries at any figure they can get from 25 cents on the dollar up. Is there a reason why these people should favor taxing American securities now exempt? I am inclined to think there is some ulterior purpose behind this movement which I have been unable to fathom.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 172, submitted by Mr. SPENCER, November 15, 1921, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I propose to take only a few moments of the Senate's time this morning in the discussion of the Newberry case.

I wish to say at the outset that I have no personal animosity of any kind, nature, or description, toward the sitting Member in this case. Indeed, I regret very much that the facts of the case are such that I can not vote to seat him. I would much prefer to vote for a sitting Member rather than to vote against him. Senator Newberry is a most delightful and pleasing gentleman, always affable and agreeable, and I imagine that practically every one who feels compelled to vote against him feels about it as I do and would very much prefer to vote for him rather than against him. It is an unpleasant task, but a compelling sense of public duty requires that I cast my vote against him.

Mr. President, the facts in the case are such that it is difficult for me to understand how any Senator, if he has read the facts in the record, can vote to have Mr. Newberry retain his seat here. Regardless of the various technicalities which have been urged in his behalf, regardless of the ways certain facts have been seized upon to establish his excuses, we are confronted with the bald proposition of fact that Senator Newberry simply bought his seat. When I say that, I think I am absolutely within the record, and I think it can be demonstrated that this is simply a case of the purchase of a seat in this body.

Why do I say that? Let us look for a moment at the surrounding facts. Senator Newberry had never been particularly active in Michigan politics. He had never rendered any great service to his party or State there. The witnesses testified that there were hardly a thousand voters in the State who knew him when he started his campaign. By reason of his being in the Navy, he was outside of the State and had no opportunity to meet the voters. He had never rendered any such service to the country that the people of the State would rise en masse on his account and put him in a great office of this kind. He had never held a State office. He had spent his life in accumulating money and not in making political friends. He had, indeed, been in the Navy Department for a short time, but this service did not bring him in contact with the voters of Michigan.

What were his claims to office? What had he done in Michigan for the Republican Party that would entitle him to a nomination to this high office? He had received more at the hands of the Republican Party in a national way than he had ever given. There was no commanding reason why he should have received this great honor while absent from the State. There were probably 10,000 Republicans in Michigan better known than Mr. Newberry. Mr. President, there was but one reason why he did receive the nomination and this seat in the Senate, and that was his money. His money was the only political asset he had, but he had that in abundant measure. He could not have counted on his oratory, because he states himself that he was never a public speaker. He could not have counted on his friends, because, upon the undisputed evidence, he had less than a thousand in the State. He did not know that many, whether they were for him or not. Less than 1,000 out of a population of 3,000,000.

In the very beginning, as one of the witnesses testified, Mr. Newberry was hardly known to a thousand men in that State. He had but one reason to believe that he would be known, and that was a proper distribution of his money. It was a question of money from the beginning. Does anybody claim that Mr. Newberry was popular in Michigan? Does anybody claim that he had performed such service for the people of Michigan that they would reward him in this way? Does he himself make the claim? All of those who are familiar with his record know that he never held any kind of public office in Michigan. He was Secretary of the Navy for four or five months, but he had never done anything while occupying that position which would entitle him to come to the Senate.

Mr. President, as I look into the facts as they appear in the record, I think I can depict just what went on in Senator Newberry's mind at the time he first entertained the project of running for the Senate. He planted his desire to become a Senator of the United States from Michigan solely on the power of his money by a proper distribution under skilled management to bring him here. It was upon no other ground. As Senators, we all know that but for his money he would never have come to this body, and therefore the question before us is, Are we going to permit any man to purchase a seat in the Senate? It is the only question in the case. He virtually admits now that his office was bought and paid for, but gives as an excuse that he did not know it.

Mr. President, this does not excuse him. Ignorance of the law does not excuse. When the junior Senator from Michigan was about to become a candidate for the office he was told in the very beginning by his campaign manager that it would cost $50,000; he was told, as stated before, that he was hardly known to a thousand voters in the State of Michigan; he was told that it would take money, money, money, to bring him here. That was immaterial to him, for he had all the money that was necessary; and no question was raised about the amount of money being expended until the newspapers in July, 1918, began to call attention to the extravagant use of money and to refer to it as a national scandal. Then the question of money was again brought to the attention of Mr. Newberry; and he called his campaign manager over the telephone and complained of the use of money; but he did not stop it. He not only knew this money was being expended but he actually complained of the expenditures while they were going on. Why did he complain if it was not his money? Why did he complain of it if he did know it was being expended, as he stated in his affidavit? Of course he knew all about it.

He had 30 days within which to tell his campaign manager, "We will not buy this election"; but he did not do it. He stood mute for those 30 days while he knew that money was being lavishly spent. Therefore it does not lie in his mouth or in the mouth of those who would vote to seat him here that, under those circumstances, he did not know that these enormous amounts of money were being spent in his behalf. Of course he knew.

Now, Mr. President, I want for a moment to take up Senator Newberry's speech which was delivered here a day or two ago. I read from page 963 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

I am here in my right as a Senator to give the facts, and nothing more.

It is perhaps unnecessary for me to say that I shall confine myself strictly and entirely to the facts as I know them to be and shall not attempt in any sense, either by argument or by appeal, to affect in the slightest degree the judgment of this body. As far as I am concerned, I desire that the facts as they are shall determine this matter.

Oh, Mr. Newberry, are you not a little late in talking about the facts in this case? You had two wonderful opportunities to talk about the facts when, if they had been favorable to you, they would have exonerated you. The first opportunity you had was when a jury of your peers in Michigan were trying you upon the facts in this case and you did not appear to testify. You offered no facts to that jury; you declined to come before that jury, and suffered a conviction and a sentence to the penitentiary. Do you not know what that indicates? If Mr. Newberry had known the facts that would have exonerated him, do we not know perfectly well that his able and splendid counsel would have put him before that jury and have let him explain those facts at that time? We all know that beyond the peradventure of a doubt. Why close our eyes to it?

Then, again, when the Supreme Court had reversed the decision of the trial court, solely upon constitutional grounds and not upon the facts, Mr. Newberry was given another chance to tell the facts for the benefit of his colleagues. The Senate committee investigating the case was overwhelmingly for him; I doubt if any Senator in the minority even felt otherwise than that he would be glad to seat him if the facts warranted it; but Mr. Newberry did not go before that committee; he did not ask to go before it; his learned counsel did not ask that he go before it, though they were there. He suffered the case to come to the Senate, without being willing to go before a committee of his own colleagues, a large majority, eight to five, being those of his own political party. He declined to give such a committee the facts. He knew no new facts Tuesday that he did not know when tried by jury or when tried by the committee. What can we say actuated him? We know what actuated him.

We know that if he had the facts within his knowledge, which facts would exonerate him, he would have made this case clear to his colleagues; he would have gone before the committee and given those facts to them. A day or two ago, on the 9th day of January, he came before this body and stated that he wanted to give the facts to the Senate in open session. Does not Mr. Newberry's statement come a little late, Senators? It will be recalled that he only came here after it had been published in the newspapers that a number of Republican Senators were going to vote against him unless he came before the Senate and made a statement that would exonerate him. He came here under this compulsion; he appeared before the Senate only after he knew that he would be defeated unless he did come before the Senate and make a statement. So he took advantage of neither of the two occasions offered to him voluntarily to make a clean breast of all the facts, and it was only when he was compelled by a statement widely published in this country that he appeared on the floor of the Senate and made the written statement to which I have referred and in which he talks about the facts and the facts as he would give them.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to read again from this very remarkable speech of the junior Senator from Michigan. In speaking of Mr. King, his manager, Senator Newberry said:

He came to New York and we had a brief interview there. We did not discuss, even indirectly, a single detail of the campaign. I recall that during the conversation had at that time Mr. King, in answer to a question as to how much it had cost the friends of Senator TOWNSEND, whose campaign Mr. King had managed, said it had cost approximately $20,000, and added that in view of the situation then existing in Michigan he thought it would cost my friends approximately $50,000 to make a comprehensive and successful campaign.

Yet with the knowledge at the outset that the campaign would cost at least $50,000, with the knowledge subsequently that the expenditure of money in that campaign was so great that it had caused a national scandal, Mr. Newberry, when his seat was bought and paid for and apparently given to him, had this to say in his report to the Secretary of the Senate:

The campaign for my nomination for United States Senator has been voluntarily conducted by my friends in Michigan. I have taken no part in it whatever, and no contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge or consent.

Oh, Senators, when Mr. Newberry comes before this body and says that he wants you to decide his case upon the facts, how can you keep from considering the undisputed fact that he knew $50,000 were going to be spent in the beginning, and that so much more was spent that it had become, according to Mr. Newberry himself, a scandal in the newspapers; and yet he says not a dollar was spent by anybody with his knowledge or consent. There is not the slightest question that he both knew of these expenditures and not only consented to them but approved them, and is now claiming the benefit of the same expenditures.

Did he consent when Mr. King told him the campaign would cost $50,000? Did he have knowledge when Mr. King told him the campaign would cost $50,000? Did he know and did he consent to the expenditure when so much money was being expended that it became a stench in the nostrils of every decent newspaper and man in this country? He accepted the office thus bought, and yet he filed an affidavit—and mind you, Senators, the affidavit constitutes the only statement under oath that Mr. Newberry has made—setting forth that—

No contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge or consent.

Is that the fact? Is there a Senator here—and I am going to stop long enough to have an answer—who believes that that statement is true? No one rises to answer.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator seems to forget that it was necessary to make these expenditures, for Mr. Newberry said to the Senate in his address that it was necessary to make them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course he says it was necessary to make them. It was the only possible way he had of coming to the Senate. But he says in his affidavit that not a dollar was spent with his knowledge or consent, and yet the undisputed fact is that there were expended in the neighborhood of at least $200,000, and if the truth were known the sum was probably several times that amount. Are we going to establish the precedent that hereafter a man, even though he may not be in the State, can by the expenditure of $200,000 to $800,000 purchase a seat in this body? If we do, then indeed this body will soon become a millionaires' club. There are many men in every State who will be able to pay such sums, corrupt the electorate, and become Members of this body. Men who, like Mr. Newberry, have no particular qualifications for the office other than great wealth will sit here. Mr. President, such a condition will mark the decay of this great Republic. If we seat Mr. Newberry we will establish such a precedent. I repeat, it is undisputed that $200,000 were spent in his campaign, and there is little doubt that the sum expended was largely in excess of that amount. What rule are we establishing when we seat Mr. Newberry? We are establishing the rule that popularity, service to the people, desires of friends, fitness for service are no longer a requisite for a man to have a seat in this body. All these count for nothing as against the one requisite of having money. All that he has to do is to put up from $200,000 to $800,000 and buy his seat; and we establish the further rule that that is a reasonable sum for any gentleman to pay for a seat in the United States Senate. Are we going to establish that rule?

Oh, but it is said that Senator Newberry did not purchase this seat himself!

Senators, we know what happened just as well as if we had been there. We are all men of the world in this body. We are familiar with conditions. Now, what happened? Let me recount to you from the record, just for a moment or two, what actually happened when Mr. Newberry became a candidate for this high office in the winter or spring of 1918.

He knew he did not have popularity. He knew he had done no great service to the people of Michigan or to the Republican Party that entitled him to this nomination. He knew less than a thousand people in Michigan; only a small portion of these were his friends. He knew that he had but one means by which he could become a Member of this body, and that means was money, and that he had the money. There were two obstacles in this money path, this golden path of Truman Newberry, to the United States Senate, the goal of his ambitions. One was the little obstacle of a corrupt practices act that Congress had passed, and very properly passed, limiting to $10,000 the amount which might be expended in both primary and regular election. The other obstacle was the $3,750 limitation imposed by the statute of Michigan.

How were these to be overcome? Why, the means adopted were perfectly simple. Mr. Newberry interposed no demurrer when Mr. King told him it would cost $50,000. That was all right. That was entirely agreeable to Mr. Newberry. There was no suggestion that he never knew where the money was coming from; and it turns out that Mr. John S. Newberry, his brother, nominally put up the money in large part. Mr. John S. Newberry, as it turns out, had given Mr. Smith a power of attorney to draw on his account. Mr. Truman Newberry had also given the same Mr. Smith a power of attorney to draw on his account; and the plan was perfectly simple—that the money for the campaign was to be drawn nominally out of Mr. John S. Newberry's account, and then made good out of Mr. Truman Newberry's account.

Does anybody, under the facts as they appear in the record, doubt that statement? Under the facts as stated by the witnesses, under the failure of the sitting Member to controvert those facts, can it be doubted in the slightest that those were the facts? Why, we know that they were the facts.

Here were the two reasons: Here was the Michigan statute, here was the congressional statute, both in the way. They had to be gotten around, and Mr. John S. Newberry's account was used as the vehicle by which they could be gotten around. Mr. Truman Newberry was eventually to pay the expenses of the campaign. Read Mr. John S. Newberry's testimony, and you can come to no other conclusion. Why, Mr. John S. Newberry is one of the most illuminating of all of the witnesses:

"Mr. Newberry, how did you happen to contribute this large sum to your brother's account?

"Well, I liked my brother.

"Did you ever talk to him about it?

"No, sir.

"Did he ever talk to you about it?

"No, sir.

"Did you ever talk to his campaign manager about it?

"No, sir.

"Did you ever talk to any of his friends about it?

"No, sir.

"Did you know how you were to put it up?

"No, sir."

This was the substance of John Newberry on this subject. Here was the brother of the candidate putting up confessedly $100,000 or more on the books, and yet he had never been asked to do it, and never told anybody he was going to do it; he never talked to his own brother about it; he never had any interest in the campaign!

Is not that a remarkable proceeding? One hundred thousand dollars may be very little to the Newberrys.

"Did you keep an account of it?

"No, sir.

"Did you ask your secretary, Mr. Smith, who had your power of attorney to draw on it, how much it cost?

"No, sir.

"Did you put any limit on him?

"No, sir.

"He had the right to draw on your account for $100,000?

"Yes, sir.

"If it had been a million dollars, he could have drawn on it?

"Yes, sir.

"And you have not asked any report of him?

"No, sir."

This is the substance of his testimony. Do reasonable men do that? Is there any man on earth who believes that those were the facts? If there is any Senator so gullible as to believe that the facts happened that way, he ought not to be a Member of this body. He ought to be removed for other reasons which I need not state.

Can anybody believe it? Why, of course, there is no man acquainted with the facts who can believe that. Of course there was an arrangement, and Mr. Smith himself gives you the key to the arrangement, because he said that afterwards, when Mr. John S. Newberry's account ran down, when his drawing on it for these expenses forced it down, he simply drew on Mr. Truman Newberry's account to make it good. Can that blind anybody? Is there any Senator who thinks that under those circumstances this money was paid out by John Newberry? The jury in Michigan found there was a conspiracy to purchase this election. Can any doubt the justice of this finding?

Senator Newberry now says that none of his money was paid out with his knowledge or consent; like his brother, he has never examined into it. He did not even say that he had examined it. I have no doubt that if his testimony were taken he would not know himself where those papers were. Just like his brother, he never asked any accounting of his agent. He told his agent what to do for him. He never asked any accounting. Neither of them has ever asked any accounting of Mr. Smith, their joint agent. Where are the papers? Where are the canceled checks? Where are the books? They are lost. They conveniently disappear.

Senator Newberry says he wants this case settled on the facts. Why does he not give us the facts? Mr. Smith's checks on Truman Newberry's account, Mr. Smith's checks on John Newberry's account would show absolutely what the facts are. Why did he not bring them here? He had the most learned counsel in this country to represent him. Why did he not bring those checks here and show them to the Senate?

My friends, those of you who are going to vote to seat Mr. Newberry, did you ever think of what he is asking you to do? He is asking you, upon your oaths of office, to seat him when he is not willing to say upon his oath what the facts are. Is not that asking a good deal of you?

Take it to yourselves. When you act to-day, if this question comes to a vote to-day, you act upon your oaths. You are not acting upon his oath. He has declined to give you his oath. The only oath that he has given you is this marvelous oath which says: "No contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge and consent." Can you cast your votes as Senators upon that remarkable statement made by the sitting Member?

Mr. President, we know what happened just as well as if we were there. This arrangement was made between Mr. Newberry and his brother that the funds primarily were to be drawn out of Mr. John S. Newberry's account and then placed back there by this common agent, Mr. Smith. We are indeed blind, we are indeed ignorant of this record, if we contend that there is any other conclusion to be drawn from this record.

I want to read you again from this statement of the sitting Member. He says he did not know what was being done. He comes here and pleads ignorance. He pleads ignorance of the law and ignorance of the facts. Can that be sustained by this record. No. He admits and the evidence shows that he knew all that was going on.

Speaking of Mr. King again, he says:

> He kept me constantly informed as to the progress of the campaign, in which I was, of course, keenly interested. On one or two occasions questions of policy were discussed between us, and in each instance the judgment of Mr. King controlled.
> As I recollect the facts, in one or two instances his action was the exact opposite of what I felt was the best thing to be done. I do not mean to say that I did not know generally what was going on in Michigan.

Listen to that!

> I do not mean to say that I did not know generally what was going on in Michigan. I had constant knowledge, as far as information was concerned, regarding the progress of the campaign, but I had no direct participation in it.

Oh, Senators, just read this record, the last 200 pages of which contain daily reports from Mr. King, the active manager of Mr. Newberry's campaign in Michigan to Mr. Newberry himself. Mr. Newberry was conducting his campaign through Mr. King. Have we any evidence that any committee conducted it? Is there the slightest statement anywhere that a committee of business men or any other committee conducted it? Mr. King, from the moment he was employed by Mr. Newberry himself in New York, reported only, according to this record, to Mr. Newberry.

He did not report to any committee anywhere at any time; and yet Mr. Newberry, in the only oath he has made in this case, says that he had no participation in this primary election and that the primary was conducted by a committee of his friends in Michigan.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment.

Mr. President, Mr. Newberry says he had no participation in this campaign. According to him it was conducted while he was out of the State. He did not make any personal canvass. He did not know enough people in Michigan to make a personal canvass. He says he could not have made it anyhow. He says he is not by nature a public speaker. He did not know the people, he never had come in contact with them, and yet he gets this enormous number of votes in Michigan, for what reason? Ah, Mr. President, for one reason, and one only, and that is Mr. Newberry's gold. His money—money, money, nothing but money—produced that result in Michigan; and there is not a Senator who can even blind himself into believing anything else. In his heart of hearts every Senator here knows that it was Mr. Newberry's money that purchased this seat in the United States Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will be brief, because my time is nearly exhausted.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator to a statement which Senator Newberry made in his address to the Senate, which I think modifies the affidavit to which the Senator from Tennessee has referred. Senator Newberry undertook to detail the circumstances under which that affidavit was made, and he said that—

The form of report furnished by the Senate under the act of Congress then supposed to be in force—but which has since been declared to be void—called for a full, correct, and itemized statement, under oath, of all campaign contributions, names of contributors, all expenditures, and the purposes for which the expenditures were made.

Then he made this significant statement:

I had not the knowledge required to make such a verified report.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will excuse me, I am not talking about formal statements; I am talking about what he said about lack of knowledge. I am talking about what he wrote with his own hand in that statement, under oath. He said that these expenditures were not made "with my knowledge or consent," and that is the issue I have with Senator Newberry. Senator Newberry said he learned of these expenditures late in the campaign, with absolute amazement. He has known about them ever since. Has he offered to resign and go before the people of Michigan and let them determine whether he was right or not, whether he was correct in the use of money, whether he had spent an unusual amount? He has not done it. I feel sorry for Senator Newberry, or for anyone who is placed in the position in which he has been placed. It is a very embarrassing position. He admits in the speech that it is a very embarrassing position. I say that he knows now what the facts are. A 10-year-old child reading this record could not blind itself to the evidence contained in the record. Under these circumstances, there is but one thing for Senator Newberry to do, and that is to resign his place in this body. He should have resigned long ago, but surely now, when it must be evident to him, when he says that the expenditure of that money in his behalf did not meet his approval, that it was entirely too large an amount, and that he was struck with amazement, how can he do anything else but resign? Under these circumstances, how can an honest man right the wrong which has been committed in his behalf otherwise than by resigning his place, and if he feels, and the people of Michigan feel, that he has been unjustly treated, let the people of Michigan send him back?

There is no reason why that course can not be pursued. It is the only honorable course for him to take at this time. With all the facts staring him in the face, with full knowledge that this enormous sum of money was spent, with full knowledge of his lack of popularity, or of even knowledge of the people, with full knowledge of his lack of peculiar qualifications for the office, with full knowledge that he had never done anything for the Republican Party or for the people of Michigan that would entitle him to this great place, there is but one thing for him to do, in honor to himself and to the country, and that is to offer his resignation as a Senator to the governor of Michigan.

Now, I want to call attention a little further to Senator Newberry's statements in the speech he made on Monday. He said:

It is and always has been my understanding that in so far as the primary in Michigan is concerned, if the cost is not borne by the candidate himself, the committee in charge of the campaign may spend whatever amount it pleases for the 11 enumerated objects which are set forth at length in the Michigan primary law. I therefore assumed from the start, and I still believe, that the law was carefully obeyed by this independent committee, which had the campaign for my primary election in hand.

Is that correct? He knew from the start of these expenditures of money, he said. Has he ever examined into them, so far as this record shows? Has he ever told his colleagues in this body what the facts are? Has he ever shown that they come within the 11 exceptions? Is there any detailed statement of any kind that indicates it? There is not a line. The books and papers are all in the hands of Mr. Newberry and his friends. If his statement is a correct statement, why did he not produce the books and papers, and put it beyond the controversy? Do not Senators know he would have done that if the statement had been true? Do they not know that if the right of any Senator to his seat were challenged and he had the evidence which would exonerate him, he would produce that evidence to his colleagues?

If my distinguished friend from Montana or from Oklahoma or from any other State had the right to his seat in this body challenged, and he had evidence of facts on record—checks, books, accounts that would exonerate him—do not Senators know that he would submit them to the Senate, and do they not know that Mr. Newberry would have submitted them if they had been favorable to him?

Under all this public pressure, under all the facts which have been brought out, is it possible that he would not have brought them if they had been favorable to him? Of course, it is not possible that he would not have done it.

This is what he said as to the campaign fund:

As to the campaign fund, the question of its acquisition or of its expenditure was never called to my attention by anyone connected with me or the campaign committee; and when I stated that no money was spent with my knowledge or consent, I endeavored to convey the same impression which I now endeavor to make clear, namely, that as for myself I was spending no money, and that I knew nothing about the expenditure of money in the campaign.

I wonder what Mr. Newberry's opinion of his colleagues is when he makes such a statement as that in the face of this record? Is it possible that Mr. Newberry can believe for a moment that any man in this body can take that statement as true? It is an astounding thing to me if he thinks that anyone could take that statement as true. He says that he knew nothing about any expenditures being made for him. Is it his idea that a man wholly unknown to the people of his State, living outside of the State, can make such a campaign as this, employing the most splendid campaign managers in every county in the State, all reporting to him daily, and that a campaign like that can be carried on without the expenditure of money by some one? Is there a man in this body who believes that? If there is, I would like to have him stand up and say that he believes it. I note that no one stands up.

I can not conceive how any man, in the light of this record, could believe it, and yet Senators are going to say they believe it if they vote to seat Mr. Newberry. There is no other answer to the question than that you believe that he had knowledge of these expenditures. Yet here are 200 pages of printed record, containing letters passing between him and his campaign manager, Mr. King, filled with evidence of his knowledge of everything that was going on, and in another part of this specious argument that was made Mr. Newberry admits that he knew everything that was going on in that campaign.

Senators, take it to yourselves. Let us take the case of a campaign made by the distinguished Presiding Officer—Mr. CUMMINS in the chair—known and loved by us all, known and loved by a tremendous majority of the people of Iowa. He has been in this body, I believe, for nearly four terms. Suppose in the primary an active, vigorous, determined, able candidate challenged his seat. Would he sit here and leave the whole matter to a committee of his friends and not go into Iowa during the campaign? I do not believe it. He had some such experience, as I recall, earlier in his political career.

Every Senator knows that he can not get by that way. If the candidate does not go and take some interest in his campaign, there is no other way it can be managed except the way in which Mr. Newberry managed it, and that is to buy the votes to be cast for him. With all the popularity of the senior Senator from Iowa, with his long service, he being known practically to every voter in his State, if an active opponent came out in a primary against him, he would not take the course which Senator Newberry took.

How much greater is the probability that Mr. Newberry could not have taken that course except for one controlling cause, and that cause was money? Mr. President, I do not believe that Mr. Truman Newberry, known only to a thousand voters in his State, would have gotten 2,000 votes in his State for the nomination if it had not been for his money. Is there a Senator who believes he would have gotten more without the use of money? I would like to have him rise in his place and say he believes he would, if he does believe it. I note again that no one rises.

We know that money came into the campaign, and certainly came by devious ways, by secret ways; we do not know where it came from exactly. The greater part of it was charged to an account and the account is not produced. If there is no justification than the expenditure of money for his having obtained this nomination, can anybody believe that we ought to seat a Senator elected under those circumstances? I do not, and however we may vote, under whatever party pressure, political pressure, or any other pressure we may operate in arriving at a conclusion, we know in our heart of hearts, just as Senator Newberry knows in his heart, that this election was bought and paid for. We know it. He knows it. No power on the face of the earth could have kept him from going before that jury in Michigan if he had not known that his seat was bought. No power on the face of the earth could have prevented him from going before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body if he had not known that his seat was bought. No power on earth could have prevented him from bringing forth the canceled checks, bringing forth the account of expenditures, and bringing forth the books if he had not known that they would show beyond the question of a doubt that he had purchased his seat.

Oh, Mr. President, this great body can not afford to have the election of its Members brought about in this debauched and venal way. We owe it to ourselves, we owe it to our country, we owe it to an upright morality in this country, to do our duty. However hard it may be on personal grounds for some of us to vote against Mr. Newberry, on the uncontradicted facts in this case we owe it to ourselves and to this body to vote to declare his seat vacant.

Now, Mr. President, one other word and I am through.

As to the campaign fund—

Said Mr. Newberry—

the question of its acquisition or its expenditure was never called to my attention by anyone connected with me or the campaign committee.

He does not say that he called it to the attention of Mr. King, which is the fact, and complained that too much money was being spent and wondering when it was going to cease. He did not say that the newspapers of his State and the newspapers of the country were calling the expenditure of money in his behalf a National scandal and a State scandal. He goes on to say—and when I stated that no money was spent with my knowledge or consent, I endeavored to convey the same impression which I now endeavor to make clear, namely, that as for myself, I was spending no money, and that I knew nothing about the expenditure of money in the campaign. I want to make this point just as strong as I am able to do, because it has been hinted that money which was contributed, without my knowledge or consent, by relatives and friends of mine, was subsequently, in some way, directly or indirectly, repaid by me, or was to be repaid by me. There is not even a shadow of truth or the slightest foundation for any such statement. I did not know what amounts were given to the campaign. I did not know by whom these amounts were given. I did not know either their source, their amount, or their use. I have never agreed, either directly or indirectly, to repay, or in any way to reimburse such contributions, either in whole or in part, nor have I, directly or indirectly, repaid or reimbursed such contributions, in whole or in part. I have never made any agreement to do so, nor have I any intention of so doing.

Ah, Mr. President, that ought not to be left to doubt and uncertainty. Mr. John Newberry testifies that he never looked into these accounts to see who paid them, and never required an accounting from Mr. Smith. The one way for Senator Newberry to put it beyond question in this body was for him to produce the canceled checks and the books and the bank books which were all under his control and which he did not produce. That was the only way to make it clear. He did not see fit to do it. Therefore he must bear the burden of not producing the evidence.

His right to his seat has been challenged since he took it. Why did he not make it clear? He and his agents are the only ones who could do it. He has had ample time. He has ample time now, if those books and papers and checks substantiate his position and prove it. All he needs to do is to rise in his place here and ask that the matter go back to the committee for that purpose. No one will object to that. He can make it beyond doubt and beyond cavil and beyond question if the facts are as he stated them. There can be no doubt about it being in his power to give the Senate the absolute facts. Has he done it? Has he offered to do it?

Do not you gentlemen who expect to vote for him to retain his seat in this body want to know something more about it than you know now? Would you not like to know how much money John Newberry actually contributed and how much was placed in John Newberry's account from Truman Newberry's account? That is a vital question, as to whether Mr. Newberry himself spent any money or not. There is no way to establish the facts except the production of the books and checks. Only Mr. Newberry can produce them. He has not done so. If he does not know anything more about this financial business than his brother John Newberry knew, who states he does not know anything about it, then he is woefully ignorant. John Newberry swore he had never examined into the expenditure of this money and he did not know what had become of the checks, never asked for an accounting from his own agent, though $100,000 was admittedly paid out. How can we believe statements of this kind made in the presence of the undisputed facts?

Mr. President, for these reasons it is impossible for me to vote to seat Mr. Newberry.

This body has fixed a rule as to expenditures in campaigns by candidates for the office of Senator of the United States, which the Supreme Court has declared to be unconstitutional as far as primaries are concerned. We fixed that rule believing it was a right rule, that it was the rule of conduct for the Senate, and the very opinion rendered by the Supreme Court said that while it was unconstitutional in so far as that court is concerned and they could not pass upon it, yet under the Constitution this body had the right to pass on the question. The virtual meaning of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Newberry case is that it declared that under the Constitution it had no right to remedy this wrong, but that under that same Constitution the Senate of the United States had the sole and only right to remedy the wrong.

Are we going to shirk our duty as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States? Are we going to shirk our duty and not comply with the rules this body itself has fixed? Though the Supreme Court holds that primary elections are not a part of the Federal machinery, yet it holds that the Constitution provides that the Senate of the United States can pass upon the qualifications of its own Members, and therefore no harm can be done. They have simply passed the question from the Supreme Court of the United States to the Senate of the United States. Will the Senate do its duty or will it obey some servile, extraneous influence and seat this Member?

Mr. President, in my judgment Mr. Newberry's seat should be declared vacant and the matter referred back to the people of Michigan.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I assume that this debate is drawing near to a close. The issue has been exhaustively and ably debated, but I am not content to let it be decided without giving utterance to my protest, by voice as well as vote, against the undertaking to have the title of the sitting Member from Michigan, Mr. Newberry, to a seat in this body declared clear and perfect. Before that is done, if it is to be done, I desire to enter my protest against it, as well as to cast my vote against it.

I am not a member of the committee which investigated the matter, and my duties have been such that I have not been able to go into the testimony and the proceedings had in that committee and elsewhere, in this matter, to a sufficient extent to justify me in undertaking to make an analytical legal argument against the claim of Mr. Newberry, with the object of trying to influence the votes of other Senators, even if I were able to do so. That has been thoroughly and ably done by others who have the ability and were in a position to do so.

However, I have gone far enough into the testimony taken in this matter and have listened sufficiently to the debate that has taken place to cause me to come to a satisfactory conclusion as to what course I should pursue, and to be able to give my reasons for the vote that I shall cast, and that I shall briefly do.

In his post-election affidavit, which is required by law to be filed with the Secretary of the Senate, Mr. Newberry made this sworn statement:

The campaign for my nomination for United States Senator has been voluntarily conducted by friends in Michigan. I have taken no part in it whatever and no contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge or consent. I have read a public statement of Paul King, executive manager, concerning expenditures made by a voluntary committee of my friends, but these were made without my knowledge or consent. I have not received any money or thing of value nor has anyone else received for me any money or thing of value, with my knowledge or consent, from any source to aid or support my candidacy for election as United States Senator.

I can not believe that statement. I do not believe it. I do not see how any other Member of this body can believe it. In the light of the admitted facts, that statement is not true. In the light of later statements made by Mr. Newberry himself on the floor of the Senate the other day that statement is not true.

According to this bland statement, one who is not acquainted with the facts might conclude that Mr. Newberry was run for United States Senator by his friends and by the people of Michigan almost without his knowledge; that he was barely aware of the fact that he was being run by others; that he really was not a voluntary candidate; that the matter was being forced upon him by a voluntary uprising of the people of that State. Those are not the facts. The admitted facts in this controversy prove that that was not the case.

Mr. Newberry's subsequent statement upon the floor of the Senate the other day proves that that was not the case. He said in this sworn statement:

My campaign for nomination for United States Senator has been voluntarily conducted by friends in Michigan.

According to the admitted facts and Mr. Newberry's own statement on the floor of the Senate, that is not true. Mr. Newberry conceived the idea of becoming a United States Senator from the State of Michigan. He conceived the idea of acquiring a seat in the United States Senate. He sent for Mr. Templeton, a business associate, and told him that he had decided to become a candidate for United States Senator, and asked Mr. Templeton to take charge of his campaign. Mr. Templeton consented to do so. Mr. Templeton did not voluntarily enter into the matter. He acted at the request of Mr. Newberry. The admitted facts that were brought out in the testimony show that Mr. Templeton acted at the request of Mr. Newberry, and Mr. Newberry stated in his statement on the floor of the Senate the other day, I believe, that he made that request of Mr. Templeton.

So that Mr. Templeton was not acting voluntarily. Mr. Cody did not act voluntarily. He acted upon request. Mr. King did not act voluntarily. He acted upon request. These people all acted upon request, and the request, directly or indirectly, of Mr. Newberry.

In addition there is no doubt, there can be no doubt, under the whole of the testimony that Mr. King was well paid for his services. He did not act voluntarily. He not only acted by request, but undoubtedly was paid for his services. So this statement of Mr. Newberry's that he acted in a rôle of absolute self-abnegation and had nothing to do with it and that the entire campaign was conducted voluntarily by friends is not true.

It can not stand in the light of the admitted facts and of Mr. Newberry's statement on the floor of the Senate. He says:

I have taken no part in it whatever.

The testimony shows that he did take a supervisory part in his campaign, and a very essential and important part. Mr. Newberry himself stated on this floor the other day that he did take a general supervisory part in it, and from his statement he took quite an active part. He frequently sent for his agents and managers, and consulted with those who were conducting the campaign. He had a number of consultations with Mr. King, who was his most active manager. Mr. Newberry himself stated on the floor of the Senate that he kept in touch with the campaign, that in a general way he knew what was going on, that he communicated and consulted frequently with those who were conducting the campaign, and that he gave advice and directions to them. He further stated, in effect, that he was like one on the outside of a baseball game who was whooping up the players and encouraging them in every way possible and inciting them to added activity and increased effort. In substance and effect that was about the language he used. That indicates that he took a very active and a very important part in the conduct of the campaign. So Mr. Newberry can not now claim that he was in a state of total ignorance and inactivity and knew nothing of what was going on and had no part in it. Mr. Newberry's statements are decidedly contradictory; and the common and ordinarily accepted rule is that when a person has rights at stake and his statements are contradictory, those statements which are most derogatory to his interest are to be accepted as true.

I think Mr. Newberry by his own confession played a very important part in his campaign. I am satisfied also that the part he played did not consist altogether of words or consultation or advice or the giving of directions. I am satisfied, from all of the evidence, that he contributed very much more than that to the conduct of his campaign. I think Mr. Newberry was the principal actor in the whole proceeding.

Mr. Newberry started the matter; it had its inception in his desire to become a United States Senator. He sent for men and asked them to take charge of his campaign. From that time on he kept in active touch with all of the campaign. So the statement in his post-election affidavit is not true when he said:

I have taken no part in it whatever.

He does not say that he took no active part; he does not say that he took no direct part; but he says he took "no part whatever." I do not believe there is a Member of this body who believes that.

Mr. Newberry has admitted in a later statement on the floor of the Senate Chamber that it is not true. His affidavit further says:

No contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge and consent.

That is very sweeping language. He does not say "no contributions or expenditures of mine"; he does not say "no contributions or expenditures of my money have been made with my knowledge or consent," but he makes a more sweeping denial than that. He says under oath:

No contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge and consent.

That statement is not only manifestly untrue, but it is palpably absurd; it is absurdly false. The undisputed facts show that Mr. King told Mr. Newberry that it would require the expenditure of $50,000 to elect him, and Mr. Newberry consented to that expenditure; he assented to the proposition; he did not dissent from it. By his words and acts he assented and consented. Consent may be expressed or implied; it may be tacit; and tacit or implied consent is many times no less strong and no less binding on the person who gives the consent in that way than expressed consent.

Every admitted fact and everything that came out in the testimony in that particular shows that when Mr. King told Mr. Newberry that it would require the expenditure of $50,000 to elect him to the Senate Mr. Newberry consented to such an expenditure, and told him to go ahead. So Mr. Newberry consented to the expenditure of $50,000; and he knew that $50,000 was expended, because he had it from his own agent that that amount would be required and would be expended.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. KING. I call the Senator's attention to a very important piece of testimony which is in the record, namely, that Mr. Newberry wrote a confidential letter in which he stated, in substance, that he was to pay for the publicity. Mr. Haskins, one of the managers of publicity—and I ask Senators to remember that Mr. Newberry said that he was to pay for the publicity—testified that Hopkins, who was the manager of publicity, planned at the outset a publicity campaign that would cost $130,000. That was in March; but he said that did not nearly begin to cover the cost of the publicity campaign. So Mr. Newberry promised to pay for publicity at the outset and they planned a $130,000 publicity campaign; but that did not begin to cover the expenditures for publicity. Moreover, the lieutenant governor of Michigan wrote to Mr. Newberry stating that rumor had it that the expenditures in his campaign exceeded six figures. So Mr. Newberry was advised of the fact from representatives of his own party before the campaign was concluded that the expenditures then had reached an amount which would be indicated by six figures.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator. There is a world of evidence in the testimony taken in the proceedings that Mr. Newberry knew that large sums of money were being expended in his behalf in his campaign. Mr. Vandenberg, during the course of the campaign, wrote Mr. Newberry that huge sums of money were being expended in his behalf by his agents to such an extent that it had become a scandal in Michigan. Mr. Newberry wrote him what he calls a "noncommittal reply," and he later wrote to his Detroit headquarters in regard thereto these words:

I am inclosing a copy of my noncommittal reply to the Grand Rapids people, which covers the situation in a rather flimsy manner.

"In a rather flimsy manner!" It is no more flimsy than was his statement in his defense made by him in the Senate.

There is an abundance of evidence, much of it coming from Mr. Newberry himself, to show that during the course of the campaign he knew and did not deny that huge sums of money were being expended in his behalf. Yet he said under oath:

No contributions or expenditures have been made with my knowledge or consent.

They were made with both his knowledge and his consent. The undisputed facts, incontrovertibly and conclusively, beyond and to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt, show that they were made with both his knowledge and consent.

The statement—I think in some respects the unfortunate statement—of Mr. Newberry made by him on the floor of the Senate a few days ago contradicts this sworn statement and shows that he did know that large sums of money were being spent with his knowledge and consent.

Mr. Newberry says further in his affidavit:

I have read a general public statement of Paul H. King concerning expenditures made by a voluntary committee of my friends, but these were made without my knowledge or consent.

He simply reiterates a false statement; that is all there is to it; he makes it again.

He says further:

I have not received any money or thing of value, nor has anyone else received for me any money or thing of value with my knowledge and consent from any source to aid or support my candidacy for election as United States Senator.

He knew that vast sums of money were being expended by his agents for publicity in Michigan in aid and support of his candidacy. He knew that large sums of money were being disbursed in other ways by his agents in Michigan in aid and support of his candidacy. He has admitted it since making this affidavit; and yet he filed the bald, naked affidavit which I have read.

No man who makes such an affidavit as that, in the face of the admitted facts and in the light of the circumstances under which it was made, can have my vote for a seat in this body. It would be violative of my sense of duty to vote to give a seat in this body to a man who has made such a statement, a sworn statement, an affidavit, in the face of the admitted facts and of his own later admissions to the contrary on the floor of the Senate.

The only reason that I can conceive why Mr. Newberry made and filed such an affidavit with the Secretary of the Senate is that he knew that some sort of an affidavit was required, and that he thought by making this general disclaimer, this statement of ignorance, he could comply with the law and avoid giving the facts as they existed.

I regard the undertaking to give Mr. Newberry a clear title to his seat in this body as an assault upon the purity of our elections, the honor and dignity of our country, and the sanctity of our institutions; and I can not permit it to be done, if it is to be done, without entering my earnest protest against it, as well as voting against it. The whole record in this case—and I have read much of it—is reeking with evidence of money spent corruptly and contrary to law. The whole case is surrounded with evidence of a disposition not only to violate the law, but to evade the law, and to avoid and suppress giving to the public the facts. There is an air of evasion about the whole thing. In the trial of the case in the Federal court in Michigan the defendant did not take the stand, did not testify, had not a word to say in his behalf. I do not wonder that he did not. He says his lawyers advised him not to take the stand. I do not wonder at it. I think they were good lawyers. His lawyers undoubtedly knew that if Mr. Newberry took the stand and testified to anything, he would be opened up to cross-examination on the whole field of operations covered by the case, and that he could not stand a grilling and merciless cross-examination without detriment to his case, embarrassment, humiliation, and mortification. His manager, Paul King, testified in the trial of Mr. Newberry, and after going into an exhaustive, direct examination, and getting his side of the case before the jury, getting the defendant's case from his standpoint before the jury, getting before the jury everything that he could in behalf of Mr. Newberry, just as the direct examination closed and as the cross-examination was about to begin, Mr. King conveniently fainted at a convenient time and was never subjected to cross-examination.

Mr. King was requested, I understand, to come before the committee of the Senate which investigated this matter, and begged to be excused on the ground that his health was too poor to stand the ordeal; and he was excused and did not have to go through the ordeal of a cross-examination there.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. I was diverted by reading; but, as I understood the Senator, if he will pardon me, I think he made an error in regard to the testimony. Mr. King did come before the subcommittee and testify, and was cross-examined by Mr. Lucking, representing the contestant, and was also examined somewhat by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and I think by Senator Wolcott, of Delaware.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator. I am glad to be set aright in that particular. I have not read all of the 2,000 pages of testimony in this case. I do not wish to misrepresent anyone or misstate any fact, and will not knowingly do so. I understood that Mr. King, when requested to come before the committee, pleaded ill health, and I thought he was excused. I did not know that he came later.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. SPENCER. I was out of the Chamber for a moment. Did I understand the Senator to say that Mr. Paul King did not appear before the committee?

Mr. KING. The Senator from Montana so stated, and I called his attention to the record.

Mr. MYERS. I did not understand the question of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. My question was, Did I understand the Senator from Montana to say that Mr. Paul King did not appear before the committee?

Mr. MYERS. I said it, and the Senator from Utah corrected me. I was glad to be corrected.

Mr. SPENCER. I did not hear the correction.

Mr. MYERS. I admitted I was in error in that respect.

Mr. SPENCER. Of course, the Senator knows that pages upon pages of Mr. Paul King's testimony was taken, and that in direct and cross examination every phase of the case was gone over, and that he was on the stand at least four different times on different days, so that both sides examined him to the full.

Mr. MYERS. No; I did not know it. I have admitted my error. I was set right by the Senator from Utah; and I am very glad that Mr. King stood the ordeal and did not faint, as he did in the trial in Michigan.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. I want to correct the statement made by the Senator from Missouri. The cross-examination of Mr. King did not show that he stood the ordeal at all. The cross-examination clearly indicated that Mr. King evaded and avoided, was not a frank or a fair witness, and displayed in his testimony a desire to cover up the facts as they were disclosed in other parts of the record.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for a moment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana again yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SPENCER. It is hard to understand the purpose of such a remark. The Senator from Utah was not there. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] was there; and you will find in the RECORD from the Senator from Ohio, who heard the examination and who participated in it, a statement of the fairness and fullness of the testimony of Mr. King.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I be pardoned again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana further yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. While it is true that I did not participate in the hearing, I have done something which perhaps the Senator from Missouri has not done. I have read the testimony of Mr. Paul King three or four times; I am familiar with it; and I repeat what I stated a moment ago, and the purpose of which was to negative the statement made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], which was a eulogy of Mr. King, and which is not warranted by the facts in the record.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not want any misunderstanding about this matter. My impression of Mr. King is that he is a very able gentleman, a very clever gentleman, a very adroit gentleman, who can turn a corner with neatness and dispatch; and let me add another word.

I have been a trial lawyer in my lifetime. I had perhaps 25 years' experience in trial work before I came here; and that criminal case in Grand Rapids was the only case within my knowledge in which very clever, very adroit lawyers put a part of the defendants on the stand and failed to put the king defendant on the stand. If there was any failure to make out the case of Mr. King's and Mr. Newberry's direct connection one with the other, it was proven by Mr. King's testimony in chief. He was not then cross-examined; but if anyone has any doubt about King's being the direct representative of Mr. Newberry, his doubts will be dissipated when he reads and studies the cross-examination of Mr. King.

If I may add a word, one of the very significant things in that cross-examination is that it developed that Mr. King was the chairman of the committee for the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] at the time of his primary, when there was no fraud and no very great extravagance in money matters; and Mr. King preserved all those records for several years; but from the very inception of the Newberry campaign by Mr. King, or very shortly thereafter, the people of Michigan, Republicans in Michigan, made wholesale charges as to the extravagant character of that campaign; and the remarkable thing is that Mr. King, who was so very careful to preserve the books and papers in the Townsend campaign, when no question was raised, does not keep the records of the Newberry committee. They are out of the reach of the law. They are not here.

There is no reasonable defense that can be made of the fact that those books are gone, except that they are purposely gone; and the men who were on that committee, and Mr. Newberry himself, can not evade or avoid the responsibility for the fact that they are missing. Neither can the majority members of this committee avoid responsibility for the fact that when it was developed that we could not get the books they denied us the right to get the secondary evidence, as we could have had it from the books of the banks.

I beg the pardon of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I am glad to have the Senator make the statement that he did.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Montana is most kind, and I am not going to intrude upon him except to make one statement, by his courtesy, and that is that what we were discussing was the fairness and fullness of the testimony of Mr. King. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has not contradicted it in the least. The praise of the Senator from Ohio for Mr. King's testimony is in the RECORD.

It is true that Mr. King was not cross-examined in Grand Rapids. Why keep back the facts? Against the advice of his physicians he insisted on going upon the stand. When the examination had proceeded as far as they wanted it to go, the man absolutely collapsed, and in an unconscious condition was carried out of the court room, until the attorneys for both sides and the judge said: "This cross-examination shall not go on."

That is the fact. Why conceal it? What purpose is there back of it? What good can come from such concealment?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, to the contrary, instead of trying to conceal it——

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I am not charging the Senator from Montana with that, because he did not do it.

Mr. MYERS. As I was saying, to the contrary, as far as I am concerned, instead of trying to conceal it, I stated that after Mr. King had gone as far as his lawyers wanted him to go, as the Senator from Missouri says, and just before the cross-examination was to begin, he conveniently fainted. I made that statement before the controversy arose.

I was saying when this colloquy arose that everything about this election bears the badge of fraud, and to my mind it is conclusively proven beyond and to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt, to have been fraudulent. The principal actor, Mr. Newberry, does not take the stand in his own behalf. Mr. King finds himself in a condition where he is not to be subjected to cross-examination when he closes his direct examination. All books, papers, accounts, and checks are gone and can not be had when it is sought to inquire into them. If there are any more evidences of fraud needed in connection with a matter under judicial inquiry, I do not know what they are. If, however, anything further is needed to show the fraud, it is the sworn statement of Mr. Newberry himself which I have read.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. ASHURST. Not only was Mr. King not cross-examined in the trial but a very remarkably painstaking attempt was made in the committee to prevent Mr. King from being cross-examined before the committee, and I ask Senators to read page 325 of the record. It will be borne in mind that he was not cross-examined in Michigan, and then, when he was brought here, they said, "He is your witness, and you can not cross-examine your own witness." On page 325 of the record this appears:

> The ACTING CHAIRMAN. All this evidence is before us in the bill of exceptions, at page 663, where it was gone into in extenso. If you have anything new, let us have it; but let us not have a repetition of this evidence now before us. The whole story of the way they started out in that campaign is in the record at present. Do not go over it again.
> Mr. ALFRED LUCKING. I want to connect it with Mr. Truman H. Newberry—

And so on.

Finally Mr. Lucking protested and said:

> I think I have read all of Mr. King's testimony.
> I consider that practically cross-examination, and I wish to test this witness, one of the most important witnesses.

Then the acting chairman said:

> This is not cross-examination. Mr. King is your own witness.

In other words, the fainting at the appropriate time prevented cross-examination in the court, and then the committee sought to prevent cross-examination before the committee.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Arizona did not read quite far enough.

Mr. ASHURST. Just a moment. Of course I do not read except what I want to read.

Mr. SPENCER. No; I know the Senator does not.

Mr. ASHURST. Every time the Senator from Missouri gets up he asserts that somebody else does not make his case. He is a strange lawyer if he expects somebody else to make his case.

Mr. SPENCER. I think that is true; but let me say to the Senator from Arizona that what he read is entirely true; when Mr. King was first upon the stand I was under the impression that he was not subject to cross-examination. However, if the Senator from Arizona had merely turned the page, he would have found that three minutes afterwards I said that I was mistaken about it and that he was subject to cross-examination. The Senator will find it on page 326, the very next page; and thereafter he was subjected to the closest cross-examination, both by Mr. Lucking, by Senator POMERENE, and by Senator Wolcott.

Mr. ASHURST. When the committee found that they could not prevent the cross-examination they yielded most gracefully.

Mr. SPENCER. No; I did it before the committee took any action. I said I was mistaken in what I had just said. I thought that King had been introduced as a witness in Grand Rapids by the Government. If that had been true he would not have been subject to cross-examination. I was mistaken in that; it was the other way, and they had a right to cross-examine him, and within a minute of time I said I was mistaken and the cross-examination opened. I know the Senator from Arizona did not know that fact, or he never would have said what he just now said, because he is a fair man and a very distinguished Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am a member of the subcommittee and I know an attempt was made to prevent the cross-examination of Paul King. I was not born yesterday; I have been in criminal courts, and I know when an attempt is made to shield a witness from a rigid cross-examination. I at least know that much.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Missouri has fully and fairly explained his mistake in that matter, and I am glad to know that the esteemed Senator from Missouri admits one mistake of what I consider many made by him in drawing his conclusions in this matter.

As I was saying when interrupted by the colloquy, Mr. Newberry has never permitted himself to be subjected to cross-examination in this matter. The only public statement he has ever made was the statement made on the floor of the Senate the other day, in which it was expressly stipulated by him and for him that he was not to be subjected to any cross-examination. He did offer to yield, and did yield, to a few questions by my colleague [Mr. WALSH], who went as far in asking Mr. Newberry questions as he could courteously and with propriety under the somewhat artificial rules of courtesy which prevail in this body. He went as far and did as much toward questioning Mr. Newberry as he could under the circumstances in a colloquy on the floor between one Senator and another, but it was in no sense a cross-examination. It was not intended to be a cross-examiation, and, in fact, Mr. Newberry had said that he would not submit to any cross-examination. He has always made that clear.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. ASHURST. Moreover, Mr. President, at an executive meeting of the committee a resolution was introduced which provided that the acting chairman should himself determine all questions as to the admissibility of testimony, but so loud and just were the protests of the minority members of the committee that even that attempt fell because of the obvious injustice. They were going to lodge with the acting chairman, who had committed himself in favor of the respondent, the sitting Member, the sole and only power to determine the admissibility of evidence. They tried and seriously considered the hampering of your committee to that extent, Mr. President. The record may not show that, but it happened.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, resuming at the point where I was making comment, even under the very limited scope of questioning to which Mr. Newberry was subjected the other day by my colleague [Mr. WALSH], the few questions which were asked him, by their answers, brought out the fact that he did personally make some contribution to his campaign, in spite of his sworn denial filed in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and the denial made on the floor of the Senate the other day.

Mr. Newberry has contended all the time that he never contributed a penny to his campaign fund, and yet, under the questions of my colleague [Mr. WALSH], he admitted the other day that when certain parties who were aiding him in his campaign, for whom he had sent, went to New York and stopped at a hotel, their bills were charged to him, and he did not deny that they were paid with his money. That money must have been spent with his knowledge and consent. The items might not have been charged to him with his knowledge at the time, but they could not have been paid with his money without his consent.

What were those conferences about? For what purpose did he send for Mr. Templeton, Mr. King, and others to come there and stop at the hotel at his expense, and confer with him? Did they confer about relief for the suffering Armenians, or the Christianizing of the heathen of the world, or about endowing some great college or hospital? No; they conferred about Mr. Newberry's campaign. That was the object of the conferences. That is why the parties were sent for, and that is why the money was paid which settled those hotel bills. It was paid out of Mr. Newberry's money, and therefore when he said in his post-election affidavit and said on the floor of the Senate that he never contributed anything to his campaign he was incorrect.

The few brief questions which my colleague was permitted to ask, under the circumstances, established the fact that Mr.

Newberry had contributed something in money to his campaign, and I believe that if in a court trial or before a committee, stripped of all fictitious surroundings of courtesy, Mr. Newberry were subjected for four or five hours to a grueling and merciless cross-examination by a skilled examiner, he would be left, at the end of the time, a most humiliated and pitiable spectacle, and I have no doubt that is the reason his attorneys never permitted him to be subjected to cross-examination, and that is doubtless the reason that he assumes the attitude that under no circumstances, no matter what statements he may make, shall he be subjected to the ordeal of a cross-examination; and I do not blame him for it.

In my opinion it will be a most unfortunate thing if Mr. Newberry is declared entitled to his seat in this body. It will be an unfortunate thing for the country and an unfortunate thing for the Senate. There has been nothing done in years, in my opinion, which has served more than that would serve to bring this body into disrepute and disfavor with the people of this country. There is already existing, and has long existed, in the popular mind of the people of this country, a feeling of dissatisfaction with this body. It has grown in disfavor, and scarcely any act which this body could commit would, in my opinion, more greatly intensify that feeling among the people of this country than to declare Mr. Newberry entitled to his seat in this body.

There is growing up in this country, and palpably manifest, a strong feeling of hostility to wealth and its possessors. I think that feeling in many respects goes too far. I think in many respects it is unjust. It does not have my approval. I do not share it. I think in large measure it is unfounded, and it does not have my sympathy; but I know of scarcely anything which could be done to aggravate and intensify that feeling more greatly than for this body, in the face of the admitted facts and the record as it stands, to declare Mr. Newberry entitled to a seat in this body. That hostile feeling is reflected in much legislation which emanates from Congress, some of which I think unjust and unwise; but, Senators, you are going to aggravate and intensify that feeling and accelerate such legislation if, in the face of the admitted facts and his own admission and the record in the case, you declare Mr. Newberry entitled to his seat in this body.

I am sorry to say I think politics will largely enter into the decision of this matter. If the facts and the record were exactly the same, and if Mr. Newberry were a Democrat, I will not say that all of the Republican Senators would vote to unseat him—I have no right to say that; but if Mr. Newberry were a Democrat, and if the facts were the same, I doubt exceedingly if there would be half a dozen Republican Senators who would vote to give him his seat.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator how many Democrats he thinks would vote in favor of unseating him if the tables were reversed?

Mr. MYERS. That is not exactly the way in which the question should be put. The logical question under the circumstances is, If he were a Democrat, under the same circumstances, how many Democrats would vote to keep him in his seat? That is the parallel question exactly. I can answer for only one Democratic Senator, and that is myself. I would vote the same as I shall vote if Mr. Newberry were a Democrat.

I believe that in a large sense the Senate of the United States is on trial in this matter before the people of the country. If the people of the country have become sufficiently acquainted with the facts in the case, even in a general way, and have been apprised of the affidavit which Mr. Newberry filed in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, his postelection affidavit, and all the admitted facts in the case, and if Mr. Newberry is declared entitled to his seat I believe it will arouse in this country an immense amount of just indignation.

I do not forget the wave of indignation that was aroused in this country when the then Senator from Illinois, Mr. Lorimer, was declared, after trial in this body, entitled to his seat. It was aroused and grew to such proportions that it brought about a second trial of that issue in this body, and the result of the second trial was that Mr. Lorimer was unseated.

Since I have been a Member of the Senate I have voted to unseat the then Senator from Illinois, Mr. Lorimer, and the then Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Stephenson, and I believe the record and the admitted facts in the pending case prove it to be a far worse case than was either one of those. I believe this case is worse than both of those put together. I believe there is more corruption exposed by the record in this case than was exposed in both the Lorimer and the Stephenson cases.

In my opinion it will be a bad thing for the United States Senate and for the country if this issue shall be decided in favor of Mr. Newberry. If this case is decided in favor of Mr. Newberry it will for generations be cited as a precedent that the United States Senate decided so-and-so; decided that if a candidate does not himself participate in the disbursing of money his friends, agents, and supporters can disburse any amount of money in his behalf in procuring his election and that his title to the seat can not be questioned. It will establish such a precedent that there will be no room for anybody ever again to be ousted from this body on account of any sum of money, no matter how large, that may be spent by his friends and agents without his actual, direct, and personal participation being proven.

I say, if a man's friends go out and commit burglary and steal a coat and he puts on the coat, he has no right to say, "Oh, I did not steal the coat; I did not commit burglary." He can not assume an air of innocence and say, "I had nothing to do with stealing the coat." I say let him take off the coat, let him divest himself of the stolen garment. There is no reason under the proof in this case, the astounding proof which Mr. Newberry says filled him with amazement when he learned the details of it, why Mr. Newberry should continue to enjoy the fruits of an unlawful act which, if not perpetrated by himself, was perpetrated by his agents, for whose acts he is, in fact and in law, responsible.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following amendment, and request that it be read at the desk for the information of the Senate and be considered as pending. I shall desire to make some observations concerning it at a later time. I ask that the amendment be read and considered as pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As a substitute for the words proposed as paragraph 3 of the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], and which the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] proposes to strike out, insert:

That whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended. The expenditure of such excessive sums, either by a candidate or by his friends and relatives in his behalf, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order that the Chair may fully understand the parliamentary status, does the Senator from Ohio offer the amendment as an amendment to the motion made by the Senator from Florida or as an amendment to the original resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WILLIS. What I had in mind was to offer it as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair now understands the situation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will offer it as an amendment taking the place of my amendment, I shall gladly withdraw my amendment with the consent of the Senate and let his amendment stand in the place of the amendment which was proposed by me.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator from Florida desires to withdraw his amendment, I shall then offer this as an original amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

Mr. TRAMMELL. On the Senator's statement I will withdraw my amendment, with the consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIS. I now offer my amendment to the original resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In lieu of paragraph 3 of the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], insert the words just read at the desk.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry first and then I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. I would like to inquire of the Chair whether or not that leaves the resolution with any recommendation as to disposition to be made of the case against Mr. Newberry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah must draw his own conclusion with regard to that subject.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether he purposes submitting, as ancillary to the amendment which he has just offered, anything in the nature of a conclusion of law or conclusion of fact, or any recommendation as to what disposition shall be made of the seat of the sitting Member?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I think the amendment is perfectly clear and speaks for itself. If the Senator from Utah will examine the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri he will observe that certain things are set forth in the third paragraph thereof. My amendment proposes to strike out that paragraph and to insert in lieu thereof the language read at the Secretary's desk.

Mr. KING. As I understand, that expresses condemnation of the large expenditures as being derogatory to the honor and dignity of the Senate. Obviously it would seem there should be a concluding part, that in view of those findings——

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator can offer such an amendment. This amendment does not include that.

Mr. KING. That the sitting Member ought not to be permitted to retain his seat in the United States Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. We will meet that question when we get to it.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly we will.

Mr. WILLIS. I have never dodged any question in this body.

Mr. KING. If the Senator does not care to offer that, perhaps some one else will.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, in my consideration of this matter I have assumed that contested elections, like all other controversies involving the life, liberty, property, reputation, and rights of a fellow citizen are to be established according to the established rules of law and justice and the evidence presented. While the Senate is the sole judge of the qualifications of its Members to occupy seats in this body, I hold it to be my duty in passing upon the qualifications of my colleagues to permit such of them as are lawfully entitled to their seats to retain them. In other words, I must assume in reaching my decision that this is still a Government of law and not of personal preference or opinion.

It is my belief that the Senate of the United States is the place above all others where justice should be done, and I do not consider that I, as a Senator, have any special license to violate the basic and sacred principles which have for centuries stood between innocent men and their accusers.

It is true that if I were to vote on this question with an eye single to the preservation of my own seat in this body I would vote to unseat Mr. Newberry. I say this because I believe that the misrepresentations and distortions of the evidence which have been given to the public by the Democratic press have created the impression that Senator Newberry contributed $195,000 to the primary compaign in Michigan and that that money was used for corrupt purposes.

The precise contrary being the fact, I feel that I have no right to join in a hue and cry against an innocent man for the purposes of self-glorification. I know that if I should do it I would have an unspeakable contempt for myself, and as between preserving a seat in this body and my own self-respect, I prefer the latter.

The sole argument in support of Mr. Newberry's enemies is based upon the fact that $195,000 was spent in the primary which nominated him. It is the personal opinion of those who seek to unseat him that such an amount could not have been legitimately expended. In other words, the time has come when United States Senators are to assume the guilt of a colleague, notwithstanding the evidence establishes his innocence. Will any man undertake to say that $195,000 could not have been spent in the great State of Michigan in advertising, in hiring campaign speakers, in political meetings, parades, and banquets, in getting voters to the polls in 1918, when the price of Ford cars went to $1,000 or more and gasoline rose to 35 cents a gallon? Mr. President, $195,000 would not have paid for the transportation of 10 per cent of the voters of Michigan to the polls, to say nothing of giving them a ride home at 1918 taxicab rates. I do not know how much could have been spent in Michigan in advertising at war-time rates, but I will guarantee that the patriotic and unbiased press of Michigan would have absorbed $195,000 in 24 hours without a penny's assistance from the outside if they had had the opportunity. I do not know how much could have been expended for banquets, with soup at 40 cents a plate, or for parades, with cotton uniforms at $30 each. Personally I do not care how soon all expenditures of money above a certain and very low limit are prohibited to candidates or their constituents, but as long as it is lawful and as long as not a word of testimony has been presented to the effect that a dollar of this money was spent unlawfully, my duty is clear.

Mr. President, Senator Newberry is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I have the honor to be the chairman. Before the agitation regarding his election began he was a constant attendant upon the meetings of that committee. He at once won my admiration and friendship because of his superior knowledge of banking and finance and his impartiality and integrity of purpose. He seemed to me to be just the kind of man who would be drafted by his party at a time when it needed a candidate who would inspire confidence and win the support of the independent voter. I did not give very close attention to the attacks upon the validity of his election when they were first given to the public. I assumed that they were of the sort that we always expect from poor losers and their friends.

I did not pay much attention to the criminal prosecutions in Michigan, considering their genesis and inspiration, and when I read of the verdict of the jury and the sentence of the court I was, to put it mildly, astounded. I was very certain that Senator Newberry had been made the victim of circumstances and that justice had been betrayed. When the Supreme Court in a unanimous opinion set the verdict aside, I was comforted and reassured, and I assumed that this decision, reached after able arguments and an exhaustive and careful consideration of the record, would end the matter. It has always seemed to me that the Senate is an utterly unfit tribunal to pass upon the validity of the election of one of its Members. The temptation to seek party or personal advantage, to misrepresent men and their motives, is irresistible. Anything approaching an impartial, nonpartisan, dispassionate consideration of a contested-election case in the House of Representatives or Senate never has and never will be had. It was for this reason that I rejoiced at Senator Newberry's vindication by the Supreme Court. I felt that it would and should be accepted by fair-minded men and women as final.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I decline to yield the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will reply to the Senator when he is through.

Mr. McLEAN. I like to be courteous to the Senator from Alabama, but I do not care to have him cool his tea in my saucer this afternoon.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will pour it on you when you are through. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEPPER in the chair). The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, Mr. Newberry was elected to the Senate at a time when the war spirit ran high. American boys were being killed by the thousands in France and millions of our best and bravest were crossing the seas to die, if need be, in defense of their country. Among them were the two sons of Mr. Newberry. Under the circumstances the patriotic people of Michigan resolved to use every legitimate means to defeat the man who had said if we entered the war the American flag should never again be raised above his property and that the word "murderer" should be written across the back of every American soldier. Money was spent by Mr. Newberry's friends, but there is no claim that a dollar of it was expended to buy or corrupt voters. At the trial by the jury the presiding judge told them to disregard the charge of bribery, as there was no evidence whatever to sustain it. The issue was not Newberry against Ford, the issue was America and her ideals and aspirations against conquest, frightfulness, and greed, and when that is the issue there are still a great many men in America who will shed their blood to the last drop and spend their money to the last dollar in defense of the flag and what it stands for. Senator Newberry and his friends are of that sort.

Mr. Newberry was a volunteer in the Spanish War and an officer in the Navy in the late war. It is true that the danger as personified by Mr. Ford might have been exaggerated; Mr. Ford might not have meant what he said; the $50,000 that he contributed to the election of President Wilson might not have saved his son Edsel from the draft; but the patriotic men and women of Michigan did not care to take chances. They called Mr. Newberry to the colors because they knew that he was an able, upright man who loved his country, the right man to head the ticket in a grave crisis and represent them in the Senate. Their motives were of the highest and their methods were legal.

The Chief Justice of the United States, a lifelong Democrat, a great lawyer, but, above all, a righteous judge, because of his abiding devotion to the truth, removed every taint of illegality from Mr. Newberry's election when in his opinion he said:

> There can be no doubt when the limitations as to expenditure which the statute imposed are considered in the light of its context and its genesis, that its prohibitions on that subject were intended, not to restrict the right of the citizen to contribute to a campaign, but to prohibit the candidate from contributing and expending, or causing to be contributed and expended, to secure his nomination and election a larger amount than the sum limited as provided in the statute. To treat the candidacy, as did the charge of the court, as being necessarily the cause, without more, of the contribution of the citizen to the campaign, was therefore to confound things which were wholly different, to the frustration of the very object and purpose of the statute. To illustrate: Under the instruction given, in every case where to the knowledge of the candidate a sum in excess of the amount limited by the statute was contributed by citizens to the campaign, the candidate, if he failed to withdraw, would be subject to criminal prosecution and punishment. So, also, contributions by citizens to the expenses of the campaign, if only knowledge could be brought home to them that the aggregate of such contributions would exceed the limit of the statute, would bring them, as illustrated by this case, within the conspiracy statute and accordingly subject to prosecution. Under this view the greater the public service and the higher the character of the candidate, giving rise to a correspondingly complete and self-sacrificing support by the electorate to his candidacy, the more inevitably would criminality and infamous punishment result both to the candidate and to the citizen who contributed.

Mr. President, Senator Newberry contributed $1,500 to the primary campaign and nothing to his election. I will vote at any time for a law that shall forbid the use of a dollar in elections in excess of the amount needed to provide tickets and polling booths and to pay actual expenses, but so long as it is legal and easy to spend money in advertising, speech making, and a dozen other ways, I can not vote to unseat an honest, upright gentleman because his friends loved him, believed in him, and spent their money legitimately for the cause he represented. There are many ways by which candidates and their friends may endeavor to secure the confidence of the voter. One way is by mendacious misrepresentation, defamation, and abuse of honest men for party or other purposes. This method does not cost money, but it will cost this Republic its life if persisted in.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] has justified the Newberry expenditure of $195,000 or $250,000, or whatever amount was expended. He has fallen into the error that some others have on the other side who have undertaken to defend the course of Mr. Newberry and his friends, who constituted a band of money marauders in the State of Michigan, making common barter of a seat in the United States Senate.

The Senator from Connecticut tells the Senate, in order to justify his position, that Mr. Ford had said something against the flag. As I understand, Mr. Ford has denied making such statements; but I do know that when the war came on and the country's life was imperiled and the boys were called to the colors, Mr. Ford went to the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and told him that he was ready to turn over all of his plants and to manufacture at cost any war materials that the country needed, and he did so. I submit that to the Senate and the country in reply to the insinuations of the Senator from Connecticut that Henry Ford was a traitor to his country.

I submit, in that connection, that Mr. Newberry, of Michigan, was representing the Government in connection with the Navy in New York, and at that time his firm, of which Mr. Templeton, his chairman, was a member, was selling thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of material to the Government, and that they made a profit on every dollar's worth that they sold. In the hour of the country's peril, when its very life was at stake, who contributed most to the winning of the war, Henry Ford, who made nothing off the Government, who would accept no profits and turned over all his industrial machinery to his Government, or Mr. Newberry, who was on the inside, and who, through his own firm, doubtless directed the sale of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of material at a magnificent profit? I will let the country decide which one of them was the best patriot in that time of trouble and danger.

I do not care whether a man was serving his country here at home or whether he had gone to the front and came back and became a candidate for the Senate and opened a money barrel and tapped other money sources and marshaled a corrupt fund and went out into a State and debauched and corrupted the voters and made barter of a seat in the Senate; he had abandoned and deserted the course that he had previously and in honor pursued, and instead of being then the friend of the country he had become his country's bitter foe. There is not any getting around that.

I am not surprised at the speech of the Senator from Connecticut. I have said here before that the Senator from Connecticut personally is a very clever gentleman. He is, I understand, a man of great wealth, and the Senator has shown to the Senate and the country by the stand he has taken to-day his own conception of just what a seat in this body means.

The effect of his statement is if a man wants to spend money for a seat here, why, let him do it. That means that if a poor man of merit is a candidate and the special interests do not want him to come here, let them put up the money and beat him. Why not? That is the deduction you draw from the speech of the Senator from Connecticut.

I want to ask the western Senators, are you going to accept this New England standard? Mr. Newberry, from Michigan, is backed up by the Senator from Connecticut. Is the standard that New England has now set up the standard that western Senators heretofore have stood for? What is going to be your judgment now? Are you going to accept that standard? I trust that you will not.

Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut is unfair in his argument. He undertook to convince the Senate that the Supreme Court had exonerated Mr. Newberry. The Supreme Court never once touched upon the facts as to his corrupting the ballot and buying the seat. The Supreme Court is silent upon that subject. It had no business to touch upon that subject. It was touching upon the subject of the constitutionality of the Federal statute which, by the sanction of this body, the sanction of the House, and the sanction and approval of the President, fixed $10,000, and no more, as the amount that could be expended in a race for the Senate. It declared that act unconstitutional. It never said that Mr. Newberry was innocent. That statement by the Senator from Connecticut can not be permitted to stand unchallenged. The Supreme Court did no such thing.

To show you that the Supreme Court meant that we had a chance to pass on this thing and that it was our duty to do so, listen: The majority opinion, written by Mr. Justice McReynolds, deals only with the question of the constitutionality of the act and concludes with these words. Now I read what Mr. McReynolds, of the Supreme Court, said:

> As "each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own Members," * * * the National Government is not without power to protect itself against corruption, fraud, or other malign influences.

Senators, we are now called upon to protect the Government from fraud and corruption in the securing of a seat in the Senate. What did Mr. Justice Pitney say? They tried to get the court out there in Michigan, the Federal judge, a Republican, to charge the jury that in the light of the evidence it ought to acquit Mr. Newberry, and a Federal judge in his own State refused to do it. The opinion of Justices Pitney, Brandeis, and Clarke upheld the court's refusal to direct a verdict for the defendants. Mr. Justice Pitney, in his opinion, says:

> It may be said, however, that, in my opinion, the trial court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendants for want of evidence of the alleged conspiracy; nor in instructing the jury that the prohibition of the statute against the expenditure and use of money by a candidate beyond the specified limit is not confined to his own money, but extends to the expenditure or use of excessive sums of money by him, from whatever source and from whomsoever derived.

Mr. President, if the position taken by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] is to become the position of this body, God help the States of this Union!

Vindication by the Supreme Court? The Supreme Court has not vindicated Mr. Newberry, and nobody can vindicate him under this testimony. You may by your votes seat him; you may have dinners like you had last night, as the rumor has it, and Senators may be sent for to go to the White House; but you are not going to vindicate him in the light of this testimony until you do it at the judgment bar of the American people.

I thank God that the terms of Senators are fixed, and that every six years they have to go back and submit their claims to the people of the various States, and if they forget the people at home and surrender here and refuse to protect the honor and integrity of this body and safeguard the rights of the American people, there is another trial to be had when they themselves must stand up accused before those who will render the verdict. I am glad that is the case.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], in what will go down in the RECORD as a classic of powerful and pungent sarcasm that he delivered here yesterday, bristling and burning with truth, said: "The question is, Shall the sale of this Newberry seat be confirmed?" That is the question. He summed it up in magnificent fashion. In that short statement he has told the truth of the story, the whole story: "Shall the sale of this seat be confirmed?" That is the question that we as United States Senators have to decide.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say at this time. I wanted to make this brief statement following the speech of the Senator from Connecticut because I want those who read the RECORD to know that there are those of us here who do not stand for the doctrine that he announced, and that it was challenged immediately, as soon as he yielded the floor. This RECORD is being read, Senators. I have received more letters for the little part I have taken in this discussion in my humble way than in connection with any question that has ever come before me in 17 years of service. I had a telegram from a man in Michigan saying: "Michigan, misled and shamed, is with you in the fight you are making against Newberry." All over the country people are writing letters, and they are commending us for the stand we are taking to make it so that no man shall rely upon his money, or the money of those who will control him, to go out into the American wheat field and sow tares there.

What does the Bible tell us about that? When the servant went out to the wheat field and returned to his master and said: "Master, there are tares in the wheat," what did the master tell him? "Just as soon as they grow large enough for you to detect and distinguish the tares from the wheat, pluck them up, bind them, and burn them." Why? In order that they should not grow up with the wheat and the grain of the tare get in with the grain of the wheat and be ground into flour to poison those who ate the flour. He said: "Pluck them up, bind them, and burn them."

What are we to do? There are tares in the senatorial wheat field. They said: "All right, wait. A jury in Michigan has named it a tare, but the case is pending in the Supreme Court. Let us wait and see what it does." The court says: "The act under which this indictment was found is unconstitutional." "All right; then we will have a Senate investigating committee to look into this case"; and the committee investigated, and even the majority, the Republicans, said he spent too much money. That designated him as a tare in the senatorial wheat field.

The minority Members said he spent too much money. That is further testimony to the effect that he is a tare, a tare who corruptly obtained a place in the senatorial wheat field of America. I appeal to you to-day, in spite of presidential patronage, in spite of influences which may be brought to bear by the administration, in spite of power which may be appealed to, to stand by our oaths and pluck up this senatorial tare in the wheat field of the Senate, cast it out, and safeguard the honor of this body.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not propose at this late hour in this debate to discuss at length the evidence in this case, but I do think that some service may be rendered by a brief review of past political events that indicate the importance the American people have heretofore attached to the methods of electing their public officials. If there is anything in the political history of our country which shows a keen sensitiveness on the part of the American people it is their determination to keep unsullied the political machinery which they use to elect men to public office.

There is no gainsaying the fact that the issue which we are discussing to-day is sure to become, in the light of our past political history, the most important domestic issue that will come before the American people in the next congressional and presidential elections. Regardless of whether political parties adopt it as an issue, the people will make it one. There is no page in the history of our American political contests that is so glorious or so impressive as the political revolutions which the people of this country have undertaken again and again to keep unsullied representative government and to keep pure and unstained the political machinery of our Government, in order that they might send into public office men free and untrammeled by political cliques or by the power and influence of money or other corrupting agencies.

Have we forgotten our recent political history? Have we forgotten the glorious struggle of our people against the influence at work to destroy representative government? What started the movement in this country for progressive and stringent election laws? In the lifetime of every Member of the Senate the people of this country have taken power out of the hands of both political parties, and have written into the law of this land enactment after enactment seeking to erect barriers against every sinister influence that might permit the election of public officials by any method other than the free, untrammeled voice of the people expressed at the ballot box.

These sweeping reforms for pure elections began with the direct primary government, which was a protest against the nomination of public officials by political conventions. Nominations were notoriously bought and sold in these conventions. Money repeatedly triumphed over real merit and ability. That system made representatives responsible not to the people but to the bosses. The leaders of both political parties opposed the direct primary at the outset, and in some quarters their opposition has continued to this day; yet, notwithstanding bitter opposition from press and politicians in different parts of the country against the direct primary, the people triumphed and took the nomination of their public officials out of political conventions, where offices were bartered and sold, and placed the power to nominate as well as to elect in their own hands and in their own keeping. To appreciate the intensity and extent of this first great political revolution against sinister control of nominations, elections, and the service of public officials, one need but recall the power of the forces that fought this reform. The people, almost alone, without organization or money to legitimately inform the electorate of the abuses, opposed by every privileged interest, political boss, and controlled press, triumphed, as they have always when a great moral issue grapples their attention and absorbs their souls.

Not satisfied that the results from even the direct primary law would keep the public service clean and untainted, they proceeded immediately to launch a movement all over this country for the enactment of corrupt-practice laws. Every legislature in the Union, and the National Congress, through unmistakable demands by the people have been forced to enact stringent laws regulating the manner of conducting campaigns and limiting and restricting the amounts of money which could be used in our elections. In addition they provided for secret ballots for themselves.

The people did not stop even with these great reforms. Only a few years ago they took away from the legislatures of this country the power to elect United States Senators, and took that power and authority to themselves by amending the Constitution. We all know to what extent these great political revolutions were opposed in the beginning by the reactionary leaders of the political organizations of both the great parties. The very foundation upon which the Progressive Party in this country was built and rose to such great influence was based on the demand for free elections and free officials in public life. The whole political history of our country shows a never-yielding fight to erect such political machinery as would guarantee them public officials, free, independent, and responsible alone to them.

The very first test of progressivism has always been for the removal of all sinister influences, political and financial, from the election of men to public office. Every true progressive is unalterably opposed to dishonest public service and corrupt elections. The people have not stopped, in their efforts to keep their public officials free agents, with these drastic enactments or laws which were considered by many very radical at the time of their enactment. The movement for the initiative and referendum in this country has represented another effort upon the part of the people to make their representative Government responsive and responsible to them. In the whole political history of our country there is nothing so striking as the sacredness, the tenderness, the sensitiveness with which the American people have looked upon every question and every issue dealing with the manner of electing their public officials and the protection of their officials from financial and sinister influences in office.

In the face of this history a record for safeguarding our elections, I repeat, which has been initiated and consummated by the people themselves in every State in the Union, it is proposed at this late day that we shall give a seat in the United States Senate to a man whose friends spent the huge sum admittedly of $200,000 to obtain a party nomination that would lead to an election to this august body.

The most important domestic issue is here to-day for its initial decision. The final verdict will come next November. No matter what the Democratic Party or the Republican Party resolves, the people will pass later upon this Michigan election. In that contest does any Senator hesitate to predict where the Progressives, Republicans, and Democrats alike will be found? Are the people after all these victories for clean elections to abandon their struggle to prevent evasion of their reforms?

The defense in this case is somewhat as follows: "How much money has been spent? Never mind; it is none of our business. In what manner was it spent? Never mind; that also is none of our business."

The only issue the Senate must consider, so the defenders of this proposition assert, is that because the sitting Senator removed himself, divested himself from all responsibility for the management, control, and direction of his own campaign, therefore it is not for the Senate to ask how much money was spent, or how it was spent, or what, if anything, was done to debauch the electorate by the use of money. They contend that an innocent beneficiary of an election can not have his title questioned regardless of the extent of money spent or the corruption practiced.

Mr. President, you can not fool the American people with such a proposition. They are possessed of common sense, and have and will exercise it, on more occasions than on the day on which they elected each one of us. They exercised it in their strenuous efforts for clean, untrammeled election laws, and in their repeated demands for honest, faithful public service. Every fight for election reforms has been due to a growing distrust upon the part of the people against their public servants. They have above all else manifested a jealous regard for incorruptible elections and courageous and honest public service.

Finally, Mr. President, in the year 1922, we are to proclaim to our people that the Senate of the United States holds that a man who is a candidate for public office can shift or shirk all responsibility over the control, direction, and management of the campaign that results in his election. If a man can escape responsibility for the manner in which his campaign is conducted, why should he not escape responsibility for his service in office?

The American people will not accept any proposition that seeks to immunize the beneficiary of public office from the responsibility of the campaign for that office. You might just as well preach the doctrine that the innocent possessor of stolen property shall not and must not give it up, because he knew nothing of the methods employed in committing the larceny. The American people, even if the Senate does not, will demand that our public officials prove their title by compliance with the law and the absence of corruption.

The issue could not be simpler. The Senate must now meet it. This and this alone is the question, Can a man announce himself as a candidate for public office, close his ears, tighten his lips, and free himself from responsibility for the manner his friends conduct his campaign, and thereby rid himself of the duty of making an open, honest, clean, and legal campaign for public office?

Whatever the verdict may be here, there is another day coming when the American people will meet this issue without hesitancy. That verdict will make it certain for all time that a man who is a candidate for office can not, whether judge on the bench or soldier on the firing line, free himself from responsibility for the methods, the character, and the kind of campaign that is waged in his behalf and results in his election.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to have read two affidavits, one by Mr. O. A. Harrington, a very prominent real estate man in the city of Detroit, and the other by John C. Montgomery, a graduate of Johns Hopkins University Medical School. These affidavits refer to Mr. Emery, the witness about whom the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] has lamented with crocodile tears, and who was not procured before the committee, nor were they able to get him at the trial of the case in Michigan. These affidavits state that Mr. Emery is now up and about, managing the construction of a $2,000,000 building in the city of Detroit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

STATE OF MICHIGAN, County of Wayne, ss:

O. A. Harrington, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is in the real estate business in the city of Detroit, Mich.; that he has lived in Detroit for more than 40 years; that he is acquainted with Mr. Benjamin F. Emery, who is in charge of the building operations of the Northwestern Building Corporation, so called, and which corporation is engaged in the construction of a theater building and business building, occupying a whole block at the northwest corner of West Grand Boulevard and Grand River Avenue, Detroit, Mich.; that he first became acquainted with said Emery personally about the 26th day of last August, although he had known him by sight and had seen him considerably about his office and the grounds of said building corporation for some weeks before that date. That since said 26th day of August last this deponent has met said Emery at his office a number of times and has discussed with him the topics of the day, and particularly the building operations and financial operations of said Northwestern Building Corporation. At said first interview, on August 26, Mr. Emery asked deponent to look over the plans of the proposed theater building, and Mr. Emery then explained said plans and the financial details of the project, its prospective income, and the like. On or about September 3 last deponent had a half-hour's conversation with said Emery, in which Mr. Emery gave deponent a prospectus of the theater project which he said he himself had gotten up, and he requested deponent to study it over and see him again, and that if deponent could interest any of his acquaintances to buy the stock, Emery said he would pay deponent a liberal commission. In that conversation he said the office had been on the grounds about some three months; that they now had nearly 500 subscribers. He stated to deponent he had recently been to Lansing negotiating with the Michigan Securities Commission to increase the capitalization of the building company from $300,000 to $500,000. He said organizing had always been his business, and mentioned his business when prospecting in the West. He also said that he was the Emery whose name had appeared in the newspapers so prominently in connection with the Newberry case. He took one of the subscription blanks and asked deponent if he would subscribe for some stock. At various dates deponent saw Emery actively engaged in his business of superintending the construction, and also dealing with people in connection with stock purchases, and the like, but had no extended conversation with him until about the 13th of September, when he saw him in company with one James Laird. Mr. Emery explained to said Laird the details of the project, and stated that they had sold 68 per cent of the stock to 522 subscribers. Laird asked Emery how long they had been operating. He replied that they opened the office the previous May 1, but had been working on the proposition one year, securing lease, organizing, and the like. Deponent asked Emery if he was at the office every day. He said, "Yes; I am here all the time every day, from half-past 7 in the morning until half-past 9 at night." Deponent saw Mr. Emery at his business at odd times throughout most of the month of September, and he appeared to be very busy, seeing many callers and directing the operations in connection with the building outdoors. Deponent has no recollection of seeing Mr. Emery again, especially, until about November 22, when he had a short conversation with him, in which Mr. Emery stated he was going to Lansing the following week to meet the State Securities Commission. Deponent remembers seeing Mr. Emery on the 3d of December, when he stated that he had just been to Lansing negotiating with the State Securities Commission in regard to their bonds. At that time he went over the figures in regard to the prospective income and expenditures of the theater and business building, the interest on bonds, annual payments on lease, cost of maintenance, overhead, and the like.

Deponent further states that from his numerous meetings with Mr. Emery and his observation of his business conduct and activities, he is able to state that during all that time Mr. Emery has been in good physical and mental condition so far as any acquaintance could detect, a thoroughly competent, able, business man, and well qualified to conduct business and to superintend large building construction and the promoting of the stock of such an enterprise; that in this deponent's opinion Mr. Emery is as well qualified, physically and mentally, to give testimony in any proceeding, legal or otherwise, as any man in the city of Detroit. This applies to his condition during the entire time since deponent first saw him and in a number of interviews that he held with Mr. Emery. Mr. Emery stated that he had been in charge of the construction work and the like of the building corporation above mentioned from the beginning of its operations, although he held no office as such in the corporation.

Deponent further says not.

O. A. HARRINGTON.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the other affidavit may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the affidavit was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF MICHIGAN, county of Wayne, ss:

John C. Montgomery, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a graduate of Johns Hopkins University Medical School and is a practicing physician in the city of Detroit, Mich., on the staff of the Henry Ford Hospital; that on Saturday, the 3d day of December, 1921, he discussed with Benjamin F. Emery, at the office of said Emery, in the building at the northwest corner of West Grand Boulevard and Grand River Avenue, Detroit, Mich., for a considerable period of time, various business matters pertaining to the Northwestern Building Corporation, which corporation is engaged in constructing a large building advertised as a "$2,000,000 theater and store building" that "will occupy the entire four-block square bound by Grand River, the Boulevard, Lothrop, and Dexter Boulevard," to "consist of 18 modern stores, dance hall, recreation center, and one of the largest and finest vaudeville theaters in the country, with seating capacity for 3,500"; that said Emery fully stated the details in connection with this project and the preparations to finance the same; that said Emery further stated that he was managing the building operations of the aforesaid corporation and had recently been in the city of Lansing, where he had appeared before the State securities commission with respect to the authorization by the commission of the sale of the securities of the aforesaid corporation; and that he had had the actual direction of the building operations of said company from its inception; that during the period of said discussion said Emery showed himself to be well oriented as to time, place, and persons, to have a keen grasp of detail, an excellent memory, and appeared possessed of unusual ability in calculation and argumentation and of considerable executive ability.

Deponent further says that he had no opportunity to make a formal physical examination of said Emery, but during said discussion deponent observed him closely and did not discover any physical or mental defect that would interfere with the said Emery giving testimony in any court of proceeding.

Deponent further says that said Emery stated during said discussion that he had been putting considerable energy into the affairs of said corporation, and deponent is of the opinion that said Emery can give testimony in any ordinary legal proceedings without the expenditure of any greater exertion than he is under at the present time.

And further deponent saith not.

JOHN C. MONTGOMERY.

My commission expires April 9, 1923.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it was somewhat tacitly understood on this side of the Chamber that there would not be a vote until about 3 o'clock, and so one Senator, who has been sick, but who is getting out of bed to come here and vote, was told that if he got here by 3 o'clock he would be in plenty of time. May I ask if there is no one on the other side of the Chamber who desires to speak? [After a pause.]

Well, Mr. President, we will get to a vote presently. I was in hopes that some one might rise at this late stage of the proceedings and defend the course of Mr. Newberry and give some excuse for his vote to seat him to-day. But the same practice of remaining silent, it seems, is to be followed to the end that has been followed from the beginning on the other side of the aisle.

There have been five speeches made, I believe, by Republican Senators in defense of Mr. Newberry, excepting Senator SPENCER, in charge of the resolution; one by his colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND]; one by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who directed the expenditure of enormous sums in the Wood campaign for the presidential nomination; one by the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] this morning.

Another speech was made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who had made a campaign against former Senator Gamble because he had voted for Lorimer in the celebrated Lorimer case. The Senator from South Dakota had won out before the electorate of his progressive State on that issue. After the Senator was elected he gave a statement to the press in which he said that he was elected as a progressive Republican; that when he should be seated he would follow such men as the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate [Mr. CUMMINS], presiding at this time. He named others than that progressive Senator, the senior Senator from Iowa. He named that Senator's colleague [Mr. KENYON].

Mr. President, before I proceed further I am going to ask that the conferences on the other side of the Chamber, which have been so frequent and constant since the beginning of this discussion, cease for a little while. I know that you are trembling in your boots; that you are shaking like frightened birds upon a rotten twig, with wings half spread ready to fly at the first breaking of the twig. I wish to call your attention before I have finished to the proposition in your State, and I am going to call you by name. If you are afraid of it and do not want to listen to it, then, Senators, excuse yourselves, but the people of your States will read what I have to say.

Here is the statement: I want Senators who are to come up for reelection next fall and their friends to hear what is going to happen to them if they vote to support Newberry to-day. Many of them have taken account of that; they have thought of it by night as well as by day. They are worried, yes, frightened at the situation. They followed the slogan of their President and "wiggled and wabbled" for some weeks, and some of you, I understand, are still wiggling and wabbling. You do not know how they are going to vote. The vote will be close, and that is why the responsibility is so much greater on each of you. A single vote may change the complexion of the United States Senate, and that is why the matter has received the serious consideration and concern, that has amounted almost to consternation, at the hands of certain Republicans, some of whom in the past have been classed as Progressives.

I am sorry the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who spoke here the other day in defense of Newberry, and who presented a legal argument, is not now in his seat. He will remember giving this statement to the country, and at that time his Progressive colleagues on the other side of the Chamber had great hopes that he would live up to it and follow the ideal to which he adverted:

I intend to cooperate in Congress with such progressive Republicans as CUMMINS and KENYON, of Iowa—

That was a great compliment to the senior Senator from Iowa—

CLAPP and NELSON, of Minnesota; LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin; BORAH, of Idaho, and others of like progressive Republican principles.

Of the progressive Senators that the Senator from South Dakota was going to follow, all who have spoken on this question have spoken against Mr. Newberry.

I do not know how the distinguished Senator from Iowa who now presides in this Chamber [Mr. CUMMINS in the chair] intends to vote. I can not imagine and will not believe that he will vote to seat Newberry. His record as a Progressive is written in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Congress to which he has been elected by that great element in the far West that has molded public opinion and forced progressive legislation here. It is a beautiful thought to remember how in the olden days, when a Senator from Wisconsin had spent $107,000 to win an election, the senior Senator from Iowa led the forces of progressivism in this Chamber and hurled his magnificent personality against those who stood at that time for mere politics. Oh, how he expended his eloquence in that fight!

Around him was the reactionary element of his party. They cringed under the lashing he gave. "Has his mind waxed weak and his heart waxed cold," that his war cry will not now tingle again in our ears? Surely the horn of Roland will sound again. Surely in this his favorite battle he will strike again for the people. Way back in the Lorimer contest case the senior Senator from Iowa led the assault against those on the other side of the Chamber who would retain Lorimer in the United States Senate. Stephenson expended only $107,000, while Newberry expended from $200,000 to $300,000, and again he led the assaults. So I shall not believe that the distinguished senior Senator from Iowa will now retrace his steps, repudiate the things for which he has fought, and vote to-day to seat Newberry. Oh, what a pang it would carry to the people of Iowa! How those who have stood by him in the great fights he has made in that State for progressivism would hang their heads in shame and apologize for the act! I believe that he who has made such a reputation in this body as a Senator and in Iowa as a progressive governor will not at this late day vote to seat a man in the Senate whose corruption is written in every page of the record of the trial of his case.

The senior Senator from Iowa has not forgotten the eloquent speeches which he made touching the primaries, and contending that they were a part of the general election of United States Senators. I quote a portion of one of those speeches. Listen to it. It sounds as good to-day as it did years ago when it was delivered. Said Senator CUMMINS:

Repeating, with slight paraphrase, the most serious and the most impressive utterance I ever heard in debate, I fear that the Senate is about to commit a grave mistake. I fear that the Senate is about to inflict all the injury that it can inflict upon the modern policy of nominating candidates for the Senate of the United States at a primary or popular election.

Some Senators here who have joined in the majority report openly and frankly avow that purpose.

Mr. President, I will wait until the conference at the Presiding Officer's desk is over. I am reading this not only for the edification of the Presiding Officer, but of those distinguished Senators who come up this fall for reelection and who are to vote on this important question. I feel a friendly interest in them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. HARRISON. The distinguished senior Senator from Iowa continued:

Other Senators, it seems to me, will lend the weight of their influence to the same result unintentionally and unconsciously.

The distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] also aligned himself on the side of progressive Republicanism and voted to oust this man who had corrupted an election.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, indeed.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Mississippi need not borrow any trouble about the Senator from Minnesota. The Senator from Minnesota will take care of himself, and does not need the Senator from Mississippi as a guardian. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I was paying the distinguished Senator from Minnesota a tribute which he seems not to appreciate. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Chair desires to announce once more that indications of approval or disapproval from the gallery are forbidden by a rule of the Senate; and at some time or other, the Chair does not know just when, the Presiding Officer of the Senate will enforce that rule. The Chair makes this suggestion simply as a warning to those who indulge in manifestations of approval or disapproval.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am not surprised that these arguments, when certain Senators apply it to their votes to-day, should make them squirm. It is natural that they should squirm. Of course I am not applying that statement to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, because I am assuming that when the vote is taken he is going to follow the record which he has made in this body on similar occasions when he has voted against those who have undertaken to corrupt elections.

However, Mr. President, I have not finished the quotation from the distinguished Senator from Iowa, who is now the Presiding Officer of the Senate. I continue reading from his address in the Stephenson case:

When we say that the corruption of a primary has no effect upon the particular Senator elected by a legislature in obedience to the primary expression, or when we say that in order to establish the corruption of the primary we must prove that enough individual voters were corrupted in order to change the results, then we have simply turned the power of money free, untrammeled, and unrestricted upon the electorate of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, from whom is the Senator now quoting?

Mr. HARRISON. I am quoting from the distinguished senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], whose eloquence burned into the hearts of Senators in the past when he fought to oust Lorimer and Stephenson from this body, but who now possesses a Sphinxlike silence.

Further along in that wonderful speech the Senator from Iowa, who is now presiding over the Senate, said:

I think it is due to the country that those Senators who may inferentially stand with the senior Senator from Idaho upon this most extraordinary proposition shall be heard before we close this debate, for I am curious to know how many men there are in this country who espouse a doctrine so full of menace, so destructive to peace and good order.

However, only a few of those who agreed with the then Senator from Idaho spoke in defense of Mr. Stephenson, and fewer have spoken in defense of Mr. Newberry in the consideration of this question than either in the Stephenson or the Lorimer case. There have been more speeches on the part of progressive Republican Senators on the other side spoken against Newberry than there have been speeches made in defense of Newberry by Senators on the other side.

Mr. President, that is not all; there is one further quotation which I desire to make from the great speech of the senior Senator from Iowa, delivered on March 27, 1912, in connection with the Stephenson case. If such a thing were possible, the Senator from Iowa was even more eloquent in this expression than in the others I have quoted. He said:

I look upon the influence of this vote as vastly more comprehensive and far-reaching than the determination of the title of Senator Stephenson to a seat in this body. We must deal justly with him; but in determining what is justice to him we ought to gravely and seriously consider what is justice to the people of the United States.

We are now engaged, throughout the whole country, in one of the most momentous struggles that civilization has ever seen in regard to representative government. No matter what may be true in the States, no matter how applicable the initiative and referendum may be to smaller communities and more homogeneous people, I think it is everywhere conceded that the Government of the United States must remain a purely representative government.

I hope that, no matter what may be the result of this controversy, the debate here will make it so clear that he who runs may read that primary elections, in the judgment of the Senate, are sacred and inviolable against the power of money and the influences of corrupt practices.

I could read from the speeches of the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], who grew eloquent in pleading for the purification of elections, but I shall not consume more of the time of the Senate. I am wondering if his silence in the consideration of this case is indicative that he, too, has deserted those principles for which in the past he has fought.

Let me say this in conclusion:

I know that some of you now do not know how you are going to vote. This question is coming straight. You are going to vote either to seat Newberry or to expel him. There will be no side issues involved. If you vote to seat him, you thereby set a precedent that millionaires and their friends only shall occupy places in this body in the future. You destroy every ray of hope to the poor, struggling, ambitious little fellow away back in the woods or in crowded cities who has read of the great men who have occupied places in this body, who entertains hope that perhaps some day he may rise, in the gift of his people, to a position here. Money is to be the measure in the future. If $200,000 is not sufficient, then you can make it more. If you set that precedent and seat Newberry to-day, a man may leave here and go to Europe and have some friend with his millions pour money into the coffers of the campaign and spend it in any way he sees fit and be elected to a seat in this Chamber. Those progressive measures that we have fought for—the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, their entrance into the primaries, the safeguards that we have thrown around the election box—will be destroyed and from this day on this body will become a degraded and degenerate institution.

Vote for him if you please. Do it because you may think that you are a part and parcel of this administration. Do it because perhaps you do not want to come under the displeasure of a presidential order or a presidential smile. Do it for social reasons if you want to. Do it because you have some pet measure that you want to pass through this body and you are afraid to vote against Newberry because the "powers that be" might place their grip of opposition upon it if you disobey their orders. But bear this in mind:

With this record before you, if you vote to seat Newberry to-day you may do to him and for him a personal favor, but you are destroying your party's future. Not only will the Democratic Party in the next campaign, now coming on, carry to the people the condemnation that you will deserve but progressives within the ranks of your own party will rise up in your States and, on hearing the news to-morrow that you voted to sell the United States Senate over to the millionaire's club, they will rise up, announce their candidacy against you, and in the primaries for a nomination this year you will meet the issue of progressive Republicanism.

Do what you please. The responsibility is great. The people are watching you and will condemn your betrayal of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment may be again stated from the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out paragraph (3) of the resolution offered by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and, in lieu thereof, to insert the following:

(3) That whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended.

The expenditure of such excessive sums either by a candidate or by his friends and relatives in his behalf either with or without his knowledge and consent being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free Government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, before a vote is had upon this amendment, I desire to modify it in one respect. As the amendment read, as I offered it, the second paragraph was as follows:

The expenditure of such excessive sums either by a candidate or by his friends and relatives in his behalf—

And so forth.

My attention has been called to the fact that the wording of that amendment would seem to express only disapproval and condemnation of the expenditure of such sums by a candidate.

I certainly had no such purpose as that, because any candidate who would do such a thing as that ought to be not only condemned and disapproved, but without question unseated. Therefore I shall perfect the amendment, with the permission of the Senate, by striking out the words "either by a candidate or by his friends and relatives," and after the word "in" striking out the word "his," so that it will read as follows:

The expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate either with or without his knowledge and consent being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free Government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

Mr. President, I offered this amendment without consultation with anyone, without any understanding or agreement with any gentleman on either side of the Chamber, but as an expression of my own thought, humble as that may be, that whatever the action of the Senate may be touching this very important question, there ought to be an expression of the policy of the Senate with reference to elections that may be held in the future.

As I view this case, Mr. President, it is not the junior Senator from Michigan who is on trial here, but it is the Senate of the United States that is on trial, and the people want to know and have a right to know what the policy of the Senate is and is to be touching this matter of great expenditures in elections.

Mr. President, threats have been bandied about this Chamber, and much has been said in the columns of the newspapers about the retiring of Members who vote this way or that way. Any man who casts a vote upon this question because of fear ought himself to be thrown out of the Senate and chased off the Capitol Grounds. So far as I am concerned, the vote that I shall cast will be based not upon threats or fear or blandishments but upon a conclusion that I have reached from a careful and conscientious study of this record. I am not influenced by threats within this Chamber or without, or from either side of the Chamber, as far as that is concerned.

My own opinion of this case is as stated in this amendment; a portion of the language of the amendment is from the majority report itself. My own opinion is that there was an excessive expenditure of money in this primary contest. I have searched the record in this case very carefully. I have listened to about all the speeches which have been made on the subject on either side of the Chamber. I listened to the address that was made by the junior Senator from Michigan; and, by the way, I want to say, without criticism of his friends in the Senate or out of it who have handled this case, that if Truman Newberry had been given a chance, in the trial in Michigan and in the investigation before the Senate committee, the situation would have been vastly different from what it is now. Truman Newberry stood here on the floor of the Senate, and in 20 minutes did himself more good than his friends had been able to do for him in 20 months. Why handle his case as if he had something to conceal? My own judgment is that he should have been invited to come before the committee; but that is neither here nor there.

Mr. President, I can not believe that this man stood here at his desk in this Chamber and, under his oath as a Senator of the United States, before his fellow Senators and as in the presence of God told one bare-faced lie after another. My own opinion is that Senator Newberry told the truth when he said that these expenditures were made without his personal knowledge or approval or consent. Personally, I am disposed to criticize his conduct, because I think he ought to have known; but I am unwilling to say that a man stands here and willfully makes statements for which, if they are not true, he ought to be convicted as a perjurer. I am not willing to put a stain upon a man simply upon implications and inferences and innuendoes, such as have been hurled across this aisle from day to day, many of them without the slightest foundation in the evidence.

Gentlemen start out talking about what the record shows; they state that it shows the expenditure of $195,000 in the early part of their speeches, before they get to the portion devoted to Wall Street, and then they easily raise it, in their heated imaginations, to $275,000, and later on in their addresses come to $500,000, and the highest figure announced, in one particular address, under the inspiration of perfervid imaginative oratory, was $800,000. It is a serious matter to undertake to convict a man of being a perjurer and a violator of law simply upon such bare, unsupported statements and implications as these.

While this man was derelict in failing to exercise a more rigid control over the conduct of his campaign, my own deliberate, conscientious judgment, based on an honest, careful examination of the sworn testimony, is that he did not have personal knowledge of these financial matters; but I do think, Mr. President, that the Senate owes it to the country to make a statement of its policy as to expenditures in elections and primaries.

What will be the result, Senators, if we shall say that there should be no limitation whatever upon expenditures in primaries and elections? The law does not now regulate the amount which can be expended in behalf of a candidate by his friends. I do not know whether it would be possible to enact such a law; I can not at this moment conceive of its terms; but there is one forum in which that matter can be settled, and that is here. I am unwilling, in the absence of such a settlement beforehand, without any statement from the Senate as to what its policy is to be, to act ex post facto and condemn and stain and ruin a man who had no reason to expect such action at the hands of the Senate from any legislation heretofore enacted or from any policy heretofore announced.

I therefore think, sir, that there ought to be a statement of the policy of the Senate, because if there is to be no statement of what the policy of the Senate is to be in the future, I tremble for the future of my country. I am not so very old, but I recall the time when it was said that fifteen or twenty thousand dollars was a large expenditure to be made in connection with a senatorial election, and I have seen the figure raised to $50,000, to $178,000, and $195,000, which, in my judgment, is vastly too high.

Shall we take the position that there is to be no limitation? I have no quarrel with wealthy men, Mr. President. Wealthy men, as a whole, are moved by the same motives and have about the same characteristics as other men. I have no quarrel with wealthy men; but I do have a quarrel with the proposition that wealth, as such, should control the deliberations of the Senate.

Shall we, therefore, by failing to adopt this amendment, say to any company of wealthy men anywhere in the country, "If you want to put a man across, come together; raise a fund as large as you want; send this man off outside of the country where he can know nothing of the campaign in his behalf, and then, though you may not buy a vote, though you may not violate the statute against bribery, you purchase all the avenues by which a candidate could approach the primary or the election; buy up the newspapers and the advertising space, and hire men. Do not hire men to work, but hire them to distribute cards; hire their automobiles."

Men understand what those things mean. Members of the Senate, the country is entitled to an expression of opinion from the Senate as to what its policy as to expenditures in primaries and elections is to be.

Therefore, sir, I have offered this amendment, and I trust it will be adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, let no Senator misapprehend or misconceive the inevitable effect of the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. I intend to vote for this amendment because, sirs, I believe that it is an accurate conclusion, fairly to be arrived at from the testimony in this case; but I challenge Senators, either the Senator from Ohio, who proposes this amendment, or others who may seek to hide themselves behind it from the responsibility for their positions upon the more important part of the resolution which would leave Mr. Newberry in his seat, to explain to the people of this Nation how it is that they declare that campaign was conducted, first, in a manner contrary to sound public policy; second, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate; and third, dangerous to free government; and yet vote to ratify and confirm the results of that election.

Will Senators contend that if the declarations of this amendment are true, if it is a fact that the election was contrary to sound public policy in that excessive sums of money were expended to encompass it; that it is harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate and dangerous to free government, yet, in spite of those three declarations, they propose to retain Mr. Newberry in his seat?

What is the first duty of a Senator? It is to act in such a way that free government will not be endangered, and if an election conducted in the manner in which this election was conducted is dangerous to free government, what Senator here or elsewhere will justify himself in ratifying and confirming that election?

No higher responsibility or duty can ever come to any Senator than that now about to be discharged by all of us. If a Senator thinks that the election was fairly conducted, or that Mr. Newberry can not be charged with the responsibility for it, he may justify himself under his oath in voting to retain him here; but if he believes that that election was so conducted that it became dangerous to free government, was harmful to sound public policy, and reflected upon the honor and dignity of the Senate, then axiomatically and without argument, if he is a Senator of honor he will vote to unseat Mr. Newberry.

The Senator from Ohio made arguments which are soundly consistent with the theory that the Senator from Michigan is not entitled to retain his seat. Mr. President, his conclusion seems to be, although he did not make it clear how he intends to vote upon the main question, that although the Senator from Michigan comes into this Chamber with a taint or a cloud upon his title, we can declare that he comes here as the result of an election which was conducted against sound public policy and harmful to the dignity and honor of the Senate and dangerous to free government and yet vote to seat him. But such a vote would be inconsistent with every sense of duty and every sense of honor.

Edwin Markham, I think it was, wrote some lines which I think appropriate in this connection. I have not read them for years, but I shall try to paraphrase them:

In storied Venice, down whose rippling streets
The stars go hurrying and the white moon beats,
Stood the great bell tower fronting seas and skies,
Facing the ages, drawing all men's eyes.
It marked the hours for Venice. All men said
Time shall not reach to bow that lofty head.
Time, that shall mark all else with ruin, must Forbear to make that shaft confess its dust.

Yet all the while in secret, without sound,
The fat worms gnawed the timbers underground,
The twisted worm whose epoch is an hour,
Caverned its way into the mighty tower,
And suddenly it swayed, it shook, it broke,
And fell in darkening thunder at one stroke.
The tall shaft, with an angel on the crown,
Fell ruining—a thousand years went down.

And so I fear, my country, not the hand
That shall hurl might and whirlwind on the land.
I fear not Titan traitors that shall rise
To stride like Brocken shadows on our skies;
I fear the vermin that shall undermine
Senate and school and citadel and shrine;
The worm of fraud, the fatted worm of ease
And all the crawling progeny of these.
I fear the vermin that shall honeycomb the towers
And walls of state in unsuspecting hours.

If this election was conducted in the manner in which the Senator from Ohio says it was conducted, if the manner of its conduct was harmful to sound public policy, reflected upon the honor and dignity of the Senate, and was dangerous to free government, and is to be unqualifiedly condemned, then the adoption of his amendment implies a denial to the sitting Member of the right to continue here.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] bases his argument upon the false theory that this expenditure of money was not unlawful. Senator Newberry said before the Senate in his defense that, as he understood the law then and now, the committee might spend anything it pleased. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], in charge of this case, said yesterday on the floor that the laws of Michigan permitted the committee to spend for 11 different purposes any amount of money they pleased. The Senator from Ohio this morning makes the argument that this amendment is necessary in order to make it wrongful in the future to spend money in this way. What does this amendment add to section 8 of the act of August 19, 1911, when the Senate, as well as the House, declared that no Senator should expend over $10,000 or more than the laws of his State allowed, or cause the same to be done?

I challenge the Senator from Missouri, in charge of this case, to show any law permitting unlimited expenditure under the laws of Michigan. I have here in my hand the statutes of Michigan. Here is the law of Michigan:

SECTION 1. No sums of money shall be paid, and no expenses authorized or incurred by or on behalf of any candidate to be paid by him in order to secure or aid in securing his nomination to any public office or position in this State, in excess of 25 per cent of one year's compensation or salary of the office for which he is candidate: Provided, That a sum not exceeding 50 per cent of one year's salary may be expended by the candidates for governor and lieutenant governor.

This is also the law of the State of Michigan in this connection:

SEC. 48. * * * It shall be unlawful for any other person to do or perform, for or on behalf of any such candidate, or to help or injure the candidacy of any candidate, any of the acts or things which it is by this act made unlawful for such candidate to do.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. It is made unlawful for a candidate in this case to expend over $3,750 in such a campaign, and made unlawful for "any other person to do" * * * "any of the acts or things which it is by this act made unlawful for such candidate to do."

I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. I am sure there can not be any difference of opinion between the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma and myself as to what the law actually is. The Senator was reading from section 3828. That section provides that a candidate shall not expend more than $3,750 in a campaign for the office of United States Senator, to be paid by him. The Senator read those words correctly. If the Senator will look at the succeeding section but one he will find in section 3830, the second section thereafter, the provision as to what any political committee, as distinguished from the candidate himself, may expend. He will find there, precisely as I said yesterday, that there are 11 specified objects in the State of Michigan for which a political committee can expend any sum of money without limit, and that has been the practice and the law and the accepted interpretation of Michigan ever since that law was enacted.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I find nothing of the kind. I find the exact contrary. Here is the language to which the Senator refers:

No candidate and no treasurer of any political committee shall pay, give, or lend, or agree to pay, give, or lend, either directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing for any nomination or election expenses whatever, except for the following purposes.

Mr. SPENCER. There you are. Now, there are 11 of them.

Mr. OWEN. Just a moment. I have the floor at present.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator has.

Mr. OWEN. No money whatever can be spent, "except for the following purposes." The exception is not as to the amount. The exception is as to the purposes, and gives no warrant to spend more than the law otherwise allows. Any lawyer who interprets this language with care, with scrutiny, with justice, will see that the exception is the exception as to the purposes and not the amount of the expenditure. All other purposes are forbidden and the door is not opened for the unlimited expenditure of money by the committee.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. It is not an exception as to amount. I yield again to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. The amount is not stated. The power of the political committee is stated. The power of the political committee is expressly provided, that they shall not either directly or indirectly expend any money except—I am reading from the statute, if the Senator will look at the record, page 932—

Except for the following purposes.

Mr. OWEN. The purposes alone are excepted.

Mr. SPENCER. I have the floor by the Senator's consent.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator has.

Mr. SPENCER. Then there follow 11 enumerated purposes for which a political committee may expend money, and there is no limitation upon that amount. I challenge the Senator from Oklahoma now to make the statement that either on the Democratic side or on the Republican side that interpretation which I give to it has not been the accepted interpretation of Michigan ever since that law was enacted.

Mr. OWEN. I care not a farthing what the politicians, Democratic or Republican, of Michigan interpret the law to be. Here is the law itself, and it says that—

No candidate and no treasurer of any political committee shall—

Directly or indirectly, expend money—

except for the following purposes.

It does not say that he may expend what he pleases for those purposes.

Mr. SPENCER. How much can be expended for those purposes? If the Senator's interpretation is right, how much can a political committee in the State of Michigan expend for meetings, conventions, and advertising?

Mr. OWEN. Three thousand seven hundred fifty dollars. [Laughter.] Oh, that is highly amusing, but that is the law of Michigan. Moreover, the Senator has never applied to the quotation here the language which forbids any person doing anything which the candidate himself is forbidden to do. What answer has the Senator to make about that language of the law of Michigan?

Mr. SPENCER. I will answer it. The Senator is a great lawyer.

Mr. OWEN. I deny the charge. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPENCER. But the Senator is reading the first section, 3828. He will find there the only limitation as to amount, and that limitation is by the provision of the section confined and limited to the candidate himself. He shall not expend by himself, out of his own pocket—the language of the section is, "to be paid by him"—more than one-half a year's salary, which the Senator is right in estimating at $3,750.

Now, when you leave the candidate himself and go to the political committee which has charge either of the primary or of the general election you have the provision of law that such committee can expend only for the following purposes——

Mr. OWEN. And then only $3,750.

Mr. SPENCER. And for the 11 enumerated purposes there is absolutely not a word of limitation. Look at it in common sense.

Mr. OWEN. I am looking at it in common honesty as well as common sense.

Mr. SPENCER. They ought to be synonymous. Look at it in the State of Oklahoma or in the State of Missouri or in the State of Michigan. The Senator knows well enough that no language could be so construed, in the absence of some express provision, that would limit a political campaign committee in the State of Michigan, with 2,200 voting precincts, with 3,600,000 people, to $3,750 as the total of their expenses for speaking and advertising and rooms and stenographers and all the other details of a campaign, which the Senator and I agree are at least not forbidden if they are not desirable.

Mr. OWEN. I decline to agree to what the Senator is asserting on this point. I call the Senator's attention again to this language of the law:

SEC. 48. * * * It shall be unlawful for any person to do * * * any of the acts or things which it is by this act made unlawful for such candidate to do.

Mr. SPENCER. Exactly.

Mr. OWEN. What answer does the Senator make?

Mr. SPENCER. What is made unlawful for the candidate to do?

Mr. OWEN. To spend more than $3,750.

Mr. SPENCER. Exactly, and no man for that candidate, as his agent for him, can do in his place what he is forbidden doing; but when you leave the candidate and go to the political committee, the State committee if you like, the political organization of the party, there the law says "when you conduct a campaign here are the 11 purposes for which you can spend money, and you can not spend it for anything else." Under those 11 purposes in that section of the statute there is not a word of limitation, and there never has been in the State of Michigan in practice.

Mr. OWEN. It was not necessary to put any words in that section, because the law flatly forbade a candidate to spend over $3,750, and forbade any other person to do what the candidate himself could not do.

Mr. SPENCER. The law does not forbid a candidate expending directly or indirectly; the law prevents a candidate from expending amounts to be paid by him in excess of half a year's salary.

Mr. OWEN. Then the Senator interprets the law to mean that while it forbids the candidate himself expending money directly, he could indirectly spend what he pleased. Such an interpretation is preposterous and is contrary to common sense and common honesty.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Oklahoma knows that the language of the statute does not mention $3,750.

Mr. OWEN. No; that was not necessary, and the Senator's observation is not relevant to the vital issue.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator knows that it has reference to half a year's salary. We have no dispute as to that.

Mr. OWEN. No.

Mr. SPENCER. Very well. Then if the Senator's interpretation is right, when a State committee had to do with the election of a secretary of state, whose salary was only $2,000 a year, the aggregate expenditures in the campaign under the law could only be half a year's salary, to wit, $1,000, for the whole campaign expenses in a great State like Michigan.

Mr. OWEN. There is no doubt about that, but the observation is utterly irrelevant—"a red herring across the path."

Mr. SPENCER. The interpretation falls to the ground; it is an absurdity.

Mr. OWEN. Not at all. There is no question that the language of the law covers every officer. The amount which may be expended is one-half of a year's salary, so far as the governor or the lieutenant governor are concerned, and a Senator is put under the same head as a governor. The amount of $3,750, therefore, is what a candidate for Senator may spend in his campaign. But that is irrelevant. The point is the Michigan law [sec. 1] forbids the candidate for the Senate to expend over $3,750 in the primary campaign, and in section 48 forbids anyone to do what the candidate is forbidden to do—that is, among other things, to expend over $3,750 in the primary campaign.

The law provides that it shall be unlawful for any other person to do or perform anything which is by the act made unlawful for such candidate to do. The Senator from Missouri can not get away from that language; it is a complete answer to his assertion that the committee could expend what the candidate was forbidden to expend.

It is a complete refutation of the pretention that the expenditure of $200,000 was lawful, much less moral, or in accord with a sound public policy or consistent with the honor and dignity of the Senate.

Mr. President, this matter should be disposed of by the application of a few basic principles. It is conceded that a vast amount of money was expended to procure this seat, and except for the expenditure of money the result would have been entirely different. Mr. Newberry, in his address to the Senate twice declared these enormous expenditures were "necessary." Necessary for what? To elect a man whom the people otherwise would have surely defeated. The only defense is that Mr. Newberry personally did not contribute any money and that he did not know of the extent of expenditures until the treasurer made his report after the primary. Mr. Newberry himself says he knew it would cost his friends $50,000, and his financial secretary paid $99,000.

This defense proceeds upon the theory that the candidate is under no obligation to find out the source or the amount of the moneys he expended, notwithstanding he was warned a considerable time before the primary that scandalous amounts were being used in a scandalous manner.

The amount conceded to have been used was approximately $200,000, which is more than twenty-six times as much as the annual salary. The amount proved to have been expended before the committee was approximately $263,000, with indirect but compelling evidence of other large expenditures. Besides this, Richard Fletcher, a State official of high position and one of Newberry's active lieutenants, declared to Frank M. Sparks, associate editor of the Grand Rapids Herald, when Mr. Sparks asserted to Fletcher that the campaign must have cost nearly half a million dollars—

Half a million hell! It cost near $800,000, and I know what I am talking about.

Assuming it was only $200,000, the amount is appalling, indefensible, and enough to make any lover of his country almost despair of our institutions, if the confessed guilt shall be condoned.

What difference does it make whether Mr. Newberry furnished this money himself or his relatives furnished it? The principle must be established by the precedent here set in this case; either that seats may be purchased or they may not be purchased.

He was told in advance, before he opened this campaign, that he could not succeed without the expenditure of a great amount of money, at least $50,000. Nevertheless, he appointed agents and entered upon the campaign. They expended this money for him, and he now asks to keep the Senator's seat so purchased. He kept in close touch with them throughout the entire campaign, receiving daily and sometimes hourly reports. His counsel conceded before the committee that he was in close touch with all the activities of the campaign, advising and counseling the committee.

Complete information by him on every point is conceded except the sources of the money and the amount of the money he expended or participated in expending. Many thousands of letters were written by the committee, forwarded to him in New York, and by him signed and mailed to his thousands of supporters all over the State of Michigan. He personally assisted the publicity director who came to New York for the purpose of preparing the advertising which was carried in all the newspapers of Michigan, costing the committee over $140,000. In different places in his letters to King Mr. Newberry describes this as "our publicity" and tells King "to keep up with full pressure." What right had he, knowing, as he says he did, the laws of the United States and the State of Michigan, to actively assist in spending these vast sums without inquiring where the money came from or how much?

For six months, from February to August 16, which was just 10 days before the primary, not a dollar was put into this campaign except those sums paid in by Mr. Newberry's own private financial secretary, Mr. Fred Smith. Do you believe he did not know something about where the money was coming from? Nobody but a baby would believe such an assertion. Why, when he was notified by Vandenberg, the Grand Rapids editor, that at least a quarter of a million dollars was being expended, did he call up Mr. Smith about it, as he himself says he did, if he did not know that Smith was furnishing money? Why did Smith telegraph him on the 28th of July that all the chief campaign expenses would have to be kept up and continued until August 27, the primary day?

When he knew early in August, as he says he did, that the whole State of Michigan was ringing charges of a boodle campaign against his committee, why did he not call up Paul King or Allan Templeton and at least make some inquiry about it?

It is unimportant and immaterial whether he knew or did not know, whether he shut his eyes or kept them open, whether he was a dunce or a knave, he can not by any right of law or morals keep this seat thus deliberately purchased for him.

It is pitiful for partisanship to run mad and strike a blow at the very vitals of free government.

If partisanship were to control the Democrats in this matter, they would be delighted to see their opponents seat Mr. Newberry, thus outraging every honest voter in the United States, no matter what his politics.

The evidence shows indisputably another unanswerable ground for unseating Mr. Newberry, and that is the hiring of political helpers and workers to use their influence all over the State of Michigan. This practice was made a criminal offense by the primary statutes of Michigan, passed in 1909. The language of that statute is as clear as daylight, saying in so many words that its intent is to prohibit the practice which had prevailed among candidates of hiring workers at and before primary. This statute only made criminal a practice which had been denounced by the courts for many years as being inherently corrupt and against public policy. The statutes were not intended to forbid, and nobody has ever claimed that it forbade the hiring of clerks, stenographers, mailing agents, publicity agents, and the like; but the practice of hiring prominent politicians to use their influence in any form to obtain an office for the candidate, whether by persuading the appointing power or by inducing the electors to vote, has long been condemned as illegal and corrupt. The Michigan statutes in the most sweeping language forbid and make criminal this practice, and I am informed that it was so passed because previous to 1909 there had been two or three very scandalous campaigns, one of which, says the New York World, was that of Mr. Truman H. Newberry in 1904, when he ran in the primaries against the present Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Denby. The newspapers of Detroit then declared unanimously that Mr. Newberry was running a "barrel" campaign.

Now, why is this practice inherently corrupt? Nothing could better illustrate it than what happened in every county of Michigan. The agents and members of the committee went into these counties, to prosecuting attorneys, the judges of probate, the sheriffs, and other prominent politicians, and deliberately hired them to work for Mr. Newberry. They paid them large sums of money, sometimes by the month, sometimes by the week, sometimes in lump. These sums were secretly paid the followers of these prominent politicians, and they did not know when they were being advised and urged to support Newberry that those who were giving this advice had been paid in cash to do it.

The committee knew this was a criminal practice and concealed these payments. Nearly all payments were made in cash and not by check, and their books did not show these payments. The treasurer's report did not show these payments, the voters did not know anything about them until the facts were shown at the Grand Rapids trial by the testimony of some 200 of these persons who received the moneys and who constituted only a fraction of those who were employed.

Now, if this had only been a few instances, perhaps it might be overlooked; but it was the organized campaign plan of Mr. Newberry's committee, and he, Mr. Newberry, knew about it, as shown by the sinister letter which King wrote to Newberry on May 30 (B. E. 743), wherein he said:

> Of course, we could find people in these counties to take up the work, but in many cases they would be lesser lights, and we want to get the principal workers if possible.

This needs no interpretation; they wanted the principal workers because they had big influence and big followings.

The minority report quotes from evidence of 36 of these prominent officials, bankers, attorneys, and the like, who were but 36 out of the 200 sworn. Read that report. They show that these men swear that they were hired for $1,200 apiece to use their political influence for Mr. Newberry. The 200 were not all; those are the ones who confessed, and are only a fraction of those who were employed all over the State. Mr. King, on the witness stand, himself admitted that money was used in all these counties. For instance, Frank O. Gilbert testified that he was grand lecturer of the Masonic Lodge and that he received $50 per month just for talking wherever he went in favor of Newberry. He was asked a question: "And the only service you performed was in boosting, as it were, Mr. Newberry in the campaign?" Answer. "That is all" (Rec., 458, 459). Angus MacEachron testified that he was active in the United Commercial Travelers' Association and that he received in all $850, $500 being salary, and "my work consisted of just talking to the traveling men, nothing else" (Rec., 405). Allan K. Moore received $1,575 salary besides a large expense bill. He gave the names, residences, and occupations of large numbers of men to whom he paid sums ranging from $10 apiece up to several hundred dollars apiece. He said: "The whole object of these trips was the sounding out of the sentiment regarding Senator Newberry's candidacy and the promotion of it as far as I could through my own individual acquaintances" (B. E., 104, 105). Edward O. McLain, an advertising man, received $800 salary besides large expense bills. He worked along the Lakes, among the marine workers, and he testified, "I took up work among the marine workers, urging them to support Newberry."

These are simply three or four samples out of the 200 sworn. This practice is condemned by the Michigan statutes, condemned by public policy, condemned by court members, by legal decisions, and condemned by the simplest rules of any morality. Mr. Newberry knew of the illegality of these payments, and all evidence of them was hidden. This universal organized plan of campaign, illegal, corrupt, effective, was alone sufficient to unseat Mr. Newberry; the statutes expressly declare not only that the candidate shall not do it, but that no person shall do it in his behalf.

I submit a few cases establishing two principles:

1. Corrupting the primary avoids the election.

2. Hiring workers for their influence is inherently corrupting and abhorrent to the law.

Livingston v. Page (Vt., 59 L. R. A., 336, 337) establishes two propositions:

First. Corruption of the primary necessarily results in corruption of the election and will avoid the election.

Second. That an agreement to use one's influence to procure another any public office is wholly void at common law as being inherently corrupt and against public policy.

In the opinion are quoted several other cases and authorities.

To the same effect on both points is McCrary on Elections (3d ed., sec. 185).

The position of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] that the hiring of persons to use their influence to promote a particular candidacy is not either prohibited by the Michigan statute or contrary to the common law and to public policy is shown to be utterly without foundation and is completely overthrown by many authorities by the notes in 51 L. R. A. (N. S.), page 551, where it is stated:

> Contracts purchasing or hiring the influence of another to further a particular election are wholly void. (Citing many cases.)

In Whitman v. Ewin (Tenn., 39 S. W., 742) the court said:

> The greater his influence, the more powerful his eloquence, the more persuasive his arts and skill, the more important it is that such powers and capabilities should be preserved and protected, unbought and unpurchasable for the benefit of the State and the public weal and only allowed to be brought into activity from purely patriotic and unselfish motives.
> All such contracts as the one alleged are corrupt, contrary to public policy, illegal, and void.

Many cases are cited to support this doctrine, and it would seem to be very important, because the Michigan statute not only makes this a criminal offense on the part of the candidate but also on the part of any other person on his behalf. You will remember that hundreds of the most influential officials and most prominent citizens were hired by the Newberry committee all over Michigan. This ought to dispose of the case alone in the mind of any honest Senator.

The Senator from Missouri maintains that the hiring of such workers was not meant by the Michigan statute. He maintains that position right in the teeth of the plain words of the statute. But if there were no statute, the foregoing cases and authorities establish the corruption of the whole procedure. The Newberry committee knew this was so, and that affords a reason why none of the payments of moneys made to these prominent persons appear in their records and why their original records were destroyed.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I yield if the Senator from Missouri wishes to be heard.

Mr. SPENCER. I am not going to make a speech, but I wish to make a brief statement, by the courtesy of the Senator from Idaho.

I approve of what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] has stated in his amendment to the resolution; I think it is a good thing to announce to the country the principle precisely as he indicated it in his amendment. I thought such language had been inserted in the report of the majority of the committee, a portion of which the Senator quoted in his amendment. Indeed, the principle was announced by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. Newberry] when he spoke on the floor of the Senate.

Therefore I desire, Mr. President, to modify Senate resolution 172, which I have offered, so that it shall incorporate the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and, further, in order that the resolution may be somewhat shortened, in my modification I have omitted the third clause of the resolution and added to the second clause a few words, so that the resolution as modified would consist of the three paragraphs, the third of which would be the clause offered by the Senator from Ohio as an amendment. I ask that the Secretary may read the resolution as I now propose to modify it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution as proposed to be modified by the Senator from Missouri.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, (1) That the contest of Henry Ford against Truman H. Newberry be, and it is hereby, dismissed.

(2) That Truman H. Newberry is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1919, and is entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States.

(3) That whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended.

The expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free Government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator from Idaho proceeds, may I interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho has been recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ascertain the parliamentary situation.

Mr. BORAH. That is the purpose for which I rose.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] has offered an amendment to the pending resolution, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] has modified his original resolution by incorporating the amendment. I wish to know if the Senator from Ohio has withdrawn his amendment?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, as I understand the statement which was just made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] he accepts the amendment which I have offered; so my amendment will be included in his resolution. That is my understanding of the parliamentary situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the parliamentary situation to be that the Senator from Missouri, within his right, modifies the resolution which he has offered, and that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] withdraws the amendment which he has offered; so that the original proposition now is the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri as modified.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment to the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I offer as an amendment to the third clause of the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, as now modified, the following:

And therefore Truman H. Newberry is not entitled to a seat in the United States Senate.

I ask that the amendment which I have now offered be read in connection with the third paragraph of the resolution of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the resolution of the Senator from Missouri as modified.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I am sure the Senator from Nebraska did not intend it, but I submit that no amendment is in order that in the final clause absolutely nullifies and contradicts a prior clause without eliminating the prior clause. In the resolution as it is now modified the second paragraph declares that Mr. Newberry was elected and is entitled to hold his seat, while the latter part of the third paragraph as now proposed to be amended by the Senator from Nebraska would, of course, if adopted, nullify and contradict the prior clause without changing its language.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that that is a matter for the Senate, and not for the Chair, to decide.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I wish to say a word on that point. The present Presiding Officer is a great lawyer; he recognizes that when a demurrer is filed as a pleading in a case the opposite party can at once ask that that pleading apply to all the papers that precede. The Senator from Missouri objects to the amendment that I have offered to the third clause of his resolution because it contradicts another clause of the resolution. I want the Chair, in deciding that point of order, if he decides it, to pass upon it as a court would pass upon a demurrer, and say that a demurrer searches the record. If he does that, he will find that the amendment accepted by the Senator from Missouri himself, embodying a new paragraph 3, nullifies paragraph 2 of his own resolution. The amendment I have offered does the same thing, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair repeats his position upon that point; that is a matter for the Senate to decide, and not for the Chair. The Senator from Idaho is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am a little more bewildered than I was when I arose, and I should like to ask the Chair what is the subject matter now before the Senate upon which we will be called upon to vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that at the present time the pending question that must be submitted first to the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, with the utmost respect for the Senate and for my colleagues, it seems to me that the resolution as now framed is somewhat disparaging to the seriousness of the controversy which is here involved. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, which has now been incorporated, I understand, by the Senator from Missouri in the resolution which he has offered, reads as follows:

3. That whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended.

The expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

Mr. President, I have only a word or two to say. If this amendment were designed, as I understand the Senator from Ohio to declare, simply to announce a policy upon the part of the Senate and the opinion is held that to declare the seat of the sitting Member vacant prior to a declaration of that policy would be in the nature of an ex post facto penalty, I beg to say that the policy of the Senate was fully declared, fully known, and fully understood at the time of the election which we are now investigating. Some years ago we passed a law which, although it was held unconstitutional, it being decided by a majority of the court that we did not have the power to pass such a law, nevertheless expressed beyond peradventure and beyond controversy what the policy of the Senate was with reference to campaign expenditures. If the resolution as now modified were adopted, it would amount to no more in the way of declaring a policy than the policy which was declared and fully understood at the time when the primary election in Michigan took place. The mere fact that the Supreme Court has held that we were technically without the authority to pass such a law does not at all militate against the proposition that it was known to be the expressed view of this body that that should be the law.

Mr. President, secondly—and this is the most serious part of it, it seems to me—Mr. Newberry is either entitled to exoneration here and to hold his seat on a level with every other Senator in this body or he should be excluded from membership here. What we do when we pass this resolution is to say to Mr. Newberry, "You may hold your seat, but you hold it here and sit in the presence of your colleagues and before the people of the world as one who has obtained it in a manner which imperils the very life of the Republic." We put the brand of shame upon Mr. Newberry as completely as if we should exclude him from the Senate when we say that he crept in here by methods and means which every Member of the body condemns as dishonorable, unpatriotic, and in violation of the law of common decency. Let us strip the resolution so as to cover the only question that is before us, and that is as to whether or not this seat should be declared vacant because the election was corrupt, and pass upon it in that form. If Mr. Newberry is entitled to a seat here, let him sit upon an equality with the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Idaho. Why should he sit here under a cloud for four years if he did not corrupt the election? If he is exonerated, if, as he says, before his God and his conscience he did nothing dishonorable, how dare you place the brand of shame upon him in this way? It is by reason of the fact, my friends, that we have not the courage to meet this thing as it should be met, and the reflection will be upon us quite as much as upon Truman H. Newberry. This resolution puts upon Newberry a stigma, it discredits his title, it dishonors his State, and yet in miserable shameless fashion you permit him to sit in a body whose very honor you declare he has compromised. Could anything be more humiliating to this body or more discreditable to men charged with a high and solemn responsibility?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am very much surprised at the construction that the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has given to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, because the construction that he gives to it involves the judgment that Senator Newberry was a party to this excessive expenditure of money.

Mr. BORAH. No; that is not what the resolution says.

Mr. LENROOT. I know that is not what it says, but that is the conclusion that the Senator from Idaho draws from the resolution when he says that the adoption of this particular amendment disgraces Senator Newberry. It could not disgrace him unless the conclusion follows that he participated in the excessive use of money.

Mr. BORAH. The resolution says, "with or without his knowledge."

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; and if any Senator believes that Senator Newberry did participate in this excessive use of money, of course, that Senator will vote against this resolution.

Likewise, the construction that is given by Senators upon the other side of the aisle as to the effect of this amendment, especially by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], is that this is a declaration that the election of Senator Newberry was secured through and because of this excessive use of money. If any Senator believes that this excessive use of money was the cause of Senator Newberry's election, that he would not have been elected without it, then I frankly say that I think it would be the duty of every such Senator to vote against the resolution.

But, Mr. President, what is this amendment? This amendment makes a declaration against the excessive use of money in Michigan or elsewhere. It makes a declaration against it although the candidate knows nothing whatever of it, has no knowledge of it, and did not consent to it; but there is not a word in this amendment from which any conclusion can be drawn that Mr. Newberry's election was the result of this excessive use of money.

Suppose the record in this case had disclosed that half a dozen men had been bribed in this senatorial election. Suppose it had also been shown that that bribery did not affect the result of the election, and that Senator Newberry was absolutely ignorant of it. Would that have affected the right of Senator Newberry to his seat? And yet, Mr. President, that being disclosed in the record, would it not be entirely proper for the Senate of the United States, in passing upon that election, to make a declaration against bribery in elections?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. This resolution says that the expenditure of $195,000 in condemned, and that is all.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Would the expenditure of $190,000 be all right?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not think so.

Mr. BORAH. The fact is the resolution says nothing except to condemn the particular amount which Mr. Newberry himself expended. It singles out Mr. Newberry's election and condemns that amount.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I drew the resolution myself, and I can not permit the Senator from Idaho to read into it that which is not there and was never intended to be there.

Mr. BORAH. It might not have been intended to be there, but it is there.

Mr. WILLIS. I understood the Senator to say that it condemns only what Mr. Newberry expended. Such language the Senator will not find in the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. The resolution begins:

That whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000—

Whose primary? Mr. Newberry's primary. You are dealing with Mr. Newberry's election; and you condemn and denounce it, and then you say: "However, Mr. Newberry, you may hold your seat."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, it seems to be very clear that it is very proper for the Senate of the United States to condemn the expenditure of $195,000 in the State of Michigan, although a Senator in voting for that resolution may also conclude and believe that Mr. Newberry is as guiltless as a newborn babe, and may also conclude and believe that the expenditure of that $195,000, instead of being an assistance to Mr. Newberry in this particular case, was a positive detriment to him, as I believe it was.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to ask the Senator why he condemns the expenditure of $195,000 when the corrupt-practices act passed by this body condemned the expenditure of a small amount?

Mr. LENROOT. The corrupt-practices act passed by this body—and the Senator will correct me if I am wrong in my construction—dealt with the expenditures of a candidate.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the corrupt-practices act passed by this body referred not only to the candidate but to any expenditure which might be caused by him or consented to by him.

Mr. LENROOT. Caused by him, certainly; but if some one in the State of Oklahoma, we will say, when the Senator was a candidate, without the knowledge of the Senator from Oklahoma, and because he believed that he ought to continue to represent his State in the Senate of the United States, undertook to spend $10,000 in the Senator's behalf, and the Senator was not a party to it in any way, does the Senator say he believes that he should have been deprived of his seat in the Senate in that event?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator, I will say that the Senator from Oklahoma took good pains to observe the laws passed by the Congress of the United States, and kept well within the bounds.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, the Senator from Wisconsin has not implied to the contrary in the least degree. The Senator from Wisconsin was putting a hypothetical case to the Senator from Oklahoma: If he had had some good friend in Oklahoma who believed that he had a serious contest before him and who, without the consent or the participation of the Senator from Oklahoma, had voluntarily expended $10,000 in his behalf, does the Senator from Oklahoma think that in such event he should be deprived of his seat in the United States Senate?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma, being kept in daily touch with a campaign carried on in his behalf, and being advised in the first place that the chairman whom he had approved expected to expend a minimum of $50,000, would have seen to it that the law was obeyed by his agents and representatives.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Wisconsin is not now speaking of agents and representatives of the Senator from Oklahoma. The Senator is asking the Senator from Oklahoma if some friend—neither his agent nor his representative—undertook to spend this amount of money in his behalf, does the Senator from Oklahoma think that he should be deprived of his seat in the United States Senate?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I should really like to come back to this resolution, because I think both the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Wisconsin are arguing a proposition which is not here.

This resolution does not refer to any expenditures except the expenditures of this particular primary. In other words, you are placed in the position that you leave it where it is, you condemn the election, you condemn the expenditure, whether Mr. Newberry knew about it or not, and yet you permit him to retain his seat; and I can not believe any Senator wants to vote for that kind of a resolution.

Here is what the resolution says:

That whether the amount expended in this primary—

The primary that we are now investigating—was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended—was in either case too large, much more than ought to have been expended. The expenditure of such excessive sums—

Where? In this primary—

That is, the amount which we have referred to—

In behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

If that does not condemn the title by which Mr. Newberry sits here, notwithstanding permitting him to hold his seat, I do not know what language would.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I claim to have only average intelligence, but I can not for the life of me see how the Senator from Idaho can contend that this language condemns the election. To condemn the election there would have to be some phrase or some paragraph in this amendment to the effect that the use of this excessive amount of money affected the result of the election, which it does not do. If I believed it did, I should agree with the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan himself, his attorneys, and, so far as I have heard anyone speak here, his supporters, have all stated that without the expenditure of this money he could not have won the primary.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be. I am not aware of that fact; but——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that from this record and from what transpired at the time I was satisfied then and I am satisfied now that Mr. Newberry would have had a much larger majority in the Michigan primary if there had been $50,000 expended instead of $195,000, and so believing I do not believe that the expenditure of this sum of money resulted in his election, but, on the contrary, I believe that the excessive use of money was to the detriment of Mr. Newberry.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think it was to the detriment of Mr. Newberry's election, because he ran, I am told, 400,000 behind his ticket; but I do not think the expenditure of that money was a detriment to his nomination. Mr. Newberry, if I correctly recall his statement—and if I am mistaken you will correct me—said that this expenditure was too large in any ordinary campaign, but that in this instance it was necessary.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is exactly right.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. Just for a moment. Mr. President, there must be no misunderstanding about this resolution. No quibbling of words can change its clear meaning. When we adopt a resolution to the effect that a man is elected and entitled to his seat, there is nothing that brings the blush of shame upon that man.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order that I may ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. SPENCER. Not for a moment. Every Senator knows that when a man is declared elected to this body and entitled to a seat, with those words go that which makes him the peer of any Senator in this body.

Mr. BORAH. That would be true if it were not for the fact that you incorporate in the resolution itself which gives him his title a declaration that he obtained his seat in a way that is contrary to the dignity of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I can not yield further. The Senator from Idaho can not read into this resolution any declaration that this election was obtained through the excessive use of money. It is not there.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I read just briefly what the Senator from Michigan himself said about it?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I can only yield for a question. I can not yield further.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is just one sentence.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not care. I do not know what the Senator from Michigan said about it. It would not affect my judgment whatever the Senator from Michigan said about it. I myself am satisfied that that excessive use of money by the friends of Mr. Newberry was a detriment to him, instead of a help.

That is all I have to say upon that feature of it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Only for a question.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that if a candidate for an office who spent a half million dollars corruptly, by reason of that fact lost a large number of votes, but because of the great majority of the party should win, he still would be entitled to his seat?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course not; the Senator does not need to ask me such a question as that. He knew beforehand what the answer would be.

Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of trying to show that there was nothing in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio and accepted by the Senator from Missouri inconsistent with the second paragraph of the resolution, declaring that Mr. Newberry is entitled to his seat. While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I shall take a moment to give my reasons for the vote which I shall cast upon this resolution when we come to its final disposition.

If I believed that Mr. Newberry was a participant in any way in this vast expenditure of money, I would not vote to seat him, of course. I frankly say that if I did not know Mr. Newberry, if I were to form a judgment from the cold letter of the record, a presumption might arise in my mind that Mr. Newberry was such a participant; but, Mr. President, exactly as cases are tried in court, where a jury is influenced in judging of the credibility of a witness by his attitude and frankness upon the stand, so, aside from the letter of the record in this case, in forming my judgment, I very properly considered Mr. Newberry's attitude throughout this protracted siege he has endured, and, taking that into consideration, and considering his speech made upon this floor, if I should conclude that Mr. Newberry had really participated in this expenditure of money, I would not only be compelled to conclude that he had violated the laws of Michigan, but that he was a liar upon the floor of the Senate of the United States.

Senators may conclude that Mr. Newberry stood upon this floor and deliberately lied; I do not. I believe he told the truth, and, believing that, I am forced to the conclusion that he did not participate in any way in the expenditure of this money.

Then, Mr. President, there is only one question remaining for me to decide in forming my own judgment, and that is, Did this vast expenditure of money, although not participated in by Mr. Newberry, result in Mr. Newberry's nomination and election, and would he not have secured the office but for this huge, and perhaps in some cases improper, expenditure? In arriving at a conclusion on that question, as I have studied the record and studied the case, as I stated a little while ago, I believe Mr. Newberry received fewer votes because of this excessive expenditure; that it harmed him rather than benefited him; that he would have been nominated exactly the same, and with a larger majority, had it not been for this excessive expenditure.

So, answering those two questions in the negative, upon my oath as a Senator I can not do otherwise than vote for the resolution declaring that Mr. Newberry was duly elected and is entitled to his seat.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I had not intended to say a word upon this subject. However, I desire to refer to the statement of the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. If I was able to understand the Senator from Ohio, he claims for the junior Senator from Michigan very much more than the Senator from Michigan claims for himself.

The junior Senator from Ohio said that he was satisfied that Mr. Newberry neither knew nor consented to the expenditure of any money in the primary or in the election. I simply request that the Senator from Ohio read the speech made in this Chamber by the junior Senator from Michigan, and if that be done, I feel sure he will not repeat the claim which he has made this afternoon.

I listened to the speech of the Senator from Michigan with a great deal of interest and a great deal of concern. I wanted to know the real situation as it was viewed by the junior Senator from Michigan. I do not believe we have been called upon to exercise our duty as Senators in a case which carries more responsibility than the case which is now presented to us, and I have sought to ascertain the truth, I have tried to learn the facts, and when the junior Senator from Michigan came before us I listened with alert ears to what he had to say. I, of course, was interested. I wanted to weigh his words, as he evidently did, when he came before us, and I submit that upon reading his own words no one can rise in this Chamber and say that this money was spent in Michigan without his knowledge or consent.

I have that speech before me, and in it he told us the story of the conversation between him and Paul King in which he himself inquired about the expenses of the campaign in Michigan; in which he inquired about the amount which had been expended by Senator TOWNSEND or his committee; in which he was told that that had cost $20,000, but that Newberry's campaign would cost not less than $50,000, in response to a question propounded by Mr. Newberry himself to Paul H. King at the time he induced Paul H. King to act as the manager of his campaign.

With that in view, I call attention to some further statements of the Senator in his speech. He said:

I do not mean to say that I did not know generally what was going on in Michigan. I had constant knowledge, as far as information was concerned, regarding the progress of the campaign, but I had no direct participation in it.

I knew, as a matter of fact, that a campaign of publicity was being extensively carried on, and I realized that such a campaign must necessarily cost a considerable sum of money.

That is the background. He said he knew what was going on in a general way, and when Senators read that in connection with his explanation of the affidavits which he filed in the office of the Secretary of the Senate the whole scene becomes perfectly plain. He quoted his own affidavit, in which he said that nothing was contributed or expended with his knowledge or consent, and then he undertook to explain it, and he did explain it, as I shall read it to the Senate. He explained it in this way, that he made that affidavit upon one of the forms gotten up by the Senate, and that these forms called for particular information. I read his own words:

As every Senator knows, this form refers only to campaign contributions, disbursements, and promises, and I think other things of value, and to nothing else.

I had not the slightest intention of misleading anyone in making this statement, nor do I believe that any fair-minded man was in the least deceived thereby.

The form of report furnished by the Senate under the act of Congress then supposed to be in force—but which has since been declared to be void—called for a full, correct, and itemized statement, under oath, of all campaign contributions, names of contributors, all expenditures, and the purposes for which the expenditures were made.

The significant sentence follows:

I had not the knowledge required to make such a verified report.

That is his explanation. He does not come here now and in this speech claim that nothing was spent without his knowledge or consent. He told us that he knew what was going on in Michigan; that he had daily reports of what was going on there; that he knew a wide and active campaign was being made, and then he told us that when he made the affidavit to the effect that there was nothing expended with his knowledge or consent he simply meant that he had no such definite knowledge as would enable him to make the detailed statement as to names, dates, and particular amounts, such as the form gotten up by the Senate required.

Instead of a denial that he knew these large sums were being expended, he came in and confessed that he did know, and he then undertook to excuse the affidavit which he had filed in the records of this body.

Instead of that being a vindication, he is convicted by his own words. He told us very frankly that his affidavit meant that and nothing more, because in the very next sentence he said:

Had my affidavit so stated this fact, all criticism would have been avoided.

What was the fact? The previous sentence:

I had not the knowledge required to make such a verified report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Therefore he swore that he had not spent anything.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Because he had not the information, the data, the names, and the amounts, he came into the Senate and made an affidavit that there was nothing expended with his knowledge or consent, and then he told us that he was entitled to make that kind of an affidavit, and that if he had simply added that to his statement there would have been no criticism of his affidavit.

Instead of being an exoneration, instead of claiming ignorance, Mr. Newberry himself came in and confessed the whole case. In view of that I would like to know how the junior Senator from Ohio can come before us this afternoon and say he believes that none of this money was spent with the knowledge or consent of Mr. Newberry.

Moreover, Mr. President, if Mr. Newberry were here now and entitled to a vote upon this amendment he would be compelled to vote against it. The amendment says that it is contrary to public policy and the dignity of the Senate to spend any such sum of money as Mr. Newberry admitted on the floor of the Senate had been expended. But what is Mr. Newberry's attitude regarding it? I read just a few words from the speech which he made to us. He said:

The amount expended was large, more than I had any idea was being expended, and more than ought to be necessary—and more than ought to be necessary to expend in any ordinary campaign. But this was not an ordinary campaign.

Listen to those words—

I will skip the next sentence. It is not necessary to put it in.

I can only say that I regret exceedingly—

Regret what? The expenditure of the money? Not at all. Listen:

I regret exceedingly the fact that so large an amount of money was necessarily expended.

That is his language.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, he admits if he had not expended that much he would have been beaten.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That certainly is the only inference which can be drawn from his language. He said it was necessary to spend that amount of money. So when you put into this resolution the language of the amendment which has been accepted by the Senator from Missouri, you condemn the position which Mr. Newberry himself takes. If Mr. Newberry were here, under his own language to us he would have to condemn the declaration of any such policy. He regretted that it was necessary to expend any such sum, but he admits that it was necessary, that he could not have been nominated otherwise, and instead of trying to excuse what was done, we hear him in language of no uncertain terms voicing his approval of what was done.

In another part of his speech he said:

I have no criticism to make of those who managed the campaign which resulted in my election to the United States Senate.

He has no criticism! Just three days ago he appeared in this Chamber, after having read the entire record, as he said he had, after admitting on the floor of the Senate that not less than $195,000 had been expended, and said he has no criticism to make. He approves what was done; that it was necessary to his election; that he could not have been nominated without it. It will be recalled that in other places he said he would be forever grateful to those who conducted his campaign with such magnificent skill and which resulted in his election to this body.

Do those words appeal to the sentiment of those who are supporting the amendment of the Senator from Ohio? We have here a case where the expenditure was made with the knowledge and consent of the candidate. We have him saying that it was necessary. We have him thanking the men who expended it for their skill in so expending it. With that situation staring us in the face, if any Senator here votes to let Mr. Newberry retain his seat, how can he vote for that amendment denouncing such act as contrary to the dignity of the Senate and contrary to public policy?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I had not contemplated talking further on the case, but because of the new situation which has arisen as the result of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] and accepted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] I wish to speak briefly.

I heartily concur with the contention made by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] that the address made before the Senate on Monday by the sitting Member, Mr. Newberry, instead of establishing his innocence goes to corroborate and confirm his guilt. The evidence which was before us before he made his statement convinced me that the sitting Member's seat was tainted with corruption, and his own admissions adds only to the other convincing testimony. Mr. Newberry admitted in his own statement that he had asked Mr. Templeton to be chairman of the so-called business men's committee.

His statement was equivalent to an admission he had in conferences with Paul King asking him to be campaign manager.

He admitted that very shortly after he and Paul King had a conference in New York, the Newberry campaign headquarters was opened in Detroit. As to his knowledge of the campaign, he said: "I had constant knowledge, as far as information was concerned, regarding the progress of the campaign, but I had no direct participation in it." He only qualified his statement by saying "direct participation." I judge he meant his participation was only indirect because he carried on the campaign through Paul King, his campaign manager. Whether he meant this or not the record is full of evidence to show he was constantly participating in the campaign through Paul King, campaign manager, and others.

Regarding expenses, he said: "I knew as a matter of fact that a campaign of publicity was being extensively carried on, and I realized that such a campaign must necessarily cost a considerable sum of money."

How did he know of the extensive campaign of publicity, and why did he know it was costing a considerable sum of money? The answer of the evidence in the case is because Paul King first told him before the campaign began that his campaign would cost $50,000 or more; because he had daily detail reports from Paul King, and knew of practically every step taken by Paul King and others working with and under him; for the reason also that the sitting Member, Mr. Newberry, also very frequently had conferences with the campaign manager and others and advised with them regarding plans.

The evidence discloses the sitting Member, Mr. Newberry, approved of the character of the campaign while it was in progress, and when he appeared before the Senate the other day he further approved of the methods and policies employed in the conduct of the campaign. Upon this subject he said:

> Whatever may happen, it is a gratification for me to remember that in the examination before the grand jury in New York City, in the diligent and detailed examinations which were made by numerous agents of the Department of Justice from Washington, in all that was brought out in the minute investigation of every step in the campaign in Michigan, in all that was presented to the grand jury at Grand Rapids, and before the petit jury who tried the Grand Rapids case, there was not the slightest evidence which involved moral turpitude in the remotest degree, nor was there any evidence, so far as I have been able to learn, of a single dollar that was spent dishonestly for corruption or bribery.

Senator Newberry now, after full knowledge of all the details of the corrupt use of money; the reprehensible methods employed in the campaign, states, with God as his witness, that "there was not the slightest evidence which involved moral turpitude in the remotest degree" nor "of a single dollar that was spent dishonestly for corruption or bribery."

Senators, do you, who have acquainted yourselves with the evidence to which he makes reference, agree with him?

What is the situation upon that subject? Mr. Newberry does not condemn the excessive expenditures of money. He does not condemn the questionable methods employed in conducting that campaign nor the debauchery and corruption plainly proven by the evidence. He in this Senate approves of the campaign. Yet certain Senators who condemn this boodle campaign favor seating him. While he defends the conduct and management of the campaign and approves of it in toto, you would clothe him with a robe of innocence. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] by his amendment would condemn the campaign corruption and the expenditure of at least $195,000, although Senator Newberry approves of it, and then as a reward to Senator Newberry he would give him his seat in this body. What are we coming to when Senators take such inconsistent positions? The sitting Member, Mr. Newberry, claims that during the campaign he did not know all the details of the expenditures.

Of course, he knew they had a great force in the field, and that they were doing a great deal of newspaper advertising. He knew, according to his statement made to the Senate, that it was costing a considerable sum of money, but since Mr. Newberry has acquired from the grand-jury investigation, from the trial in the lower court in Michigan, a minute and detailed knowledge of the campaign that was carried on in behalf of his nomination, he now, with full knowledge of the details, comes before the Senate and says that from all this testimony he is gratified to see that there is no evidence of any use of money in an improper, dishonest, or corrupting way.

Now, what does that mean? That means that as far as Mr. Newberry is concerned he approves of the conduct of that campaign. We have evidence here in great abundance, and that evidence is the evidence that Mr. Newberry is talking about when he talks about the evidence before the grand jury and before the trial court at Grand Rapids. Upon all of that evidence Mr. Newberry said he is very much gratified that there was nothing done during the campaign involving moral turpitude, that there was nothing done of a corrupting nature.

The question resolves itself into one of what a man believes constitutes "moral turpitude," what "bribery" and "corruption" mean.

Mr. President, I can not concur with Mr. Newberry's conception of what constitutes moral turpitude, what is involved in the definition of corruption and bribery. Mr. Newberry, admitting his familiarity with the testimony in all the court proceedings following the primary, could not have meant anything other than that he approved of the methods employed in the campaign. Then, he approved of the hiring of field workers at $30 to $75 a week; he approved of the hiring of chairmen and secretaries of county committees, some of them having received as much as $1,200 compensation. He approved of large sums being placed in the hands of field agents, in the hands of chairmen of county committees, to be used by them in all manner of corrupting and buying up men to use their influence for him. He approved of agents working for him going to men for Osborn and other opponents and telling them if they would work for Newberry they would be paid to do so. He thinks this reprehensible way of buying up men was all right.

His statement means he approved of the hiring of workers upon primary day at the polls in a large number of cities in Michigan; that he approved of the expenditure of fabulous sums in many instances for the purpose of buying certain newspapers that were not naturally inclined to support Mr. Newberry's campaign.

The record of the grand-jury investigation and the trial at Grand Rapids is full of testimony to prove that these outrageous forms of corruption were carried on without limit in the Newberry campaign, and yet he says he was gratified that this evidence did not prove any moral turpitude or bribery or corruption.

Mr. Newberry in his own defense—this defense which the Senator from Ohio said vindicated him—came here and approved of the conduct of this campaign, the conduct of which brands it as a barrel campaign, as a boodle campaign, as one of the most corrupt campaigns within the history of American politics.

His statement to the Senate vindicated him! No; it only established more conclusively his guilt.

Now, I submit, Mr. President, that if we are going to write into this resolution an amendment setting forth that we condemn the excessive use of money in this campaign, either by Mr. Newberry or by anyone else, and that such conduct is inimical to our system of government and endangers and threatens our free elections, if that is the expressed sentiment of the Senate, how can we consistently seat the man who was the moving factor in the campaign, in intimate touch with the campaign, who knew that it was costing an excessive amount of money, and who later comes here and approves and commends the methods employed in the campaign? How can we condemn the one and accept the other?

I admit, Mr. President, that, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the excessive expenditure of money, the corruption which was perpetrated in that campaign, did doubtless injure Mr. Newberry's cause in the general election. It should have done so. It was that, however, which caused him to win the nomination in the primary; it was that which caused him to drive from the field aspirants like ex-Gov. Warner and Senator William Alden Smith; it was that which brought about the crippling of ex-Gov. Osborn in that campaign, for at that time and up to the time of the primary the people of Michigan were not very well informed upon what had been done by the Newberry campaign organization; they were not familiar in detail with the corruption of the ballot. They knew that a "barrel" or two "barrels" had been opened, but they did not know much of the details. The Newberry campaign organization had denied the charges.

This corruption procured for Mr. Newberry the election. Senators upon this floor defending him have claimed that he was unknown and that it was necessary for him to make large expenditures; he himself practically claims that it was necessary to make them; but after the primary, then, as the Senator from Wisconsin stated, these facts came to the surface; the people of Michigan began to find out more in detail about the corruption, and many of them, regardless of their party ties, despite whatever may have been Mr. Ford's record in regard to the World War, went to the polls at the general election and registered their protest against Mr. Newberry because of the methods by which his primary campaign had been conducted.

The junior Senator from Michigan received only about 4,000 majority in the election, when it was customary for Michigan to go Republican by 100,000 to 125,000 majority. But the fact that it injured him when the character of his primary campaign became known is no reason why he should be seated; the fact that 100,000 people of Michigan rebelled against such conduct, rebelled against a "barrel" campaign, rebelled against the corruption that ran through the entire campaign from beginning to end, forcefully suggests to United States Senators that they, too, should condemn the corruption and debauchery by the use of $200,000 or more in the Newberry campaign. A Michigan jury convicted Mr. Newberry for his part in this campaign. A Federal judge who heard all the testimony sentenced him to two years' imprisonment.

Senators who are going to vote to seat Mr. Newberry now say they will write into the resolution a paragraph condemning the campaign resulting in his nomination and election. I am glad that you admit that the campaign was corrupt and constituted an election scandal that should be severely condemned; but when you do so, then you can not, even in a remote degree, justify yourself in seating Mr. Newberry, and thereby make him the beneficiary of that which you condemn.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, it seems to me that the only effective and proper way to deal with a case of this character would be to visit our disapproval upon the man who seeks to enjoy the fruits of the corruption which was perpetrated for the purpose of winning an election to the United States Senate. Indeed, it would be a great error on the part of the Senate to seat Mr. Newberry and at the same time condemn the methods which were employed in his campaign; methods which he himself, since he has at last broken his masterful silence, approves and commends. You can not by any such tactics vindicate the sitting Member, Mr. Newberry.

What do you think men with their "barrels" of gold, who have an eye upon the United States Senate, will think as to their fate if they desire to aspire to the Senate and purchase a seat in this body? They will be justified in saying, "There are a lot of men in Washington in the United States Senate who, for political purposes and to fool the people back home, write into a resolution in a case involving the expenditure of a great deal of money, which was used to purchase a seat in the United States Senate, that they do not approve of that kind of conduct; but they were not serious. I will go out and I will purchase a seat in the United States Senate for $200,000 or more, and I will be seated just as Senator Newberry was seated."

I do not care, Mr. President, to be placed in any such ridiculous attitude as that. The Senators should have the courage and meet the issue as men. If that campaign should be condemned, and in my opinion it should be in unequivocal language, condemn it, but do not make yourselves ridiculous by condemning the campaign of corruption and debauchery, resulting in Mr. Newberry's election, and then reward him by giving him a seat in the Senate. If you do, your inconsistent attitude will be disappointing to the American people, who will, in my opinion, in time rebuke in no uncertain terms those who by seating Mr. Newberry approve of a seat being purchased in this body at a price of $200,000 or more.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate very long. There are many on this side and a few Senators on the other side of the Chamber who have been here right along during the trial of this case, but most of them have not been present at all. I have seen faces here to-day that have become almost strangers to me, the faces of Senators who have come into the Senate on the eve of the vote in this case. One of the Senators on the other side who has been away, when confronted with damaging statements that Mr. Newberry had made, said that whatever Mr. Newberry said would not have any effect on his judgment. In view of that situation, Mr. President, I should think if Mr. Newberry were to plead guilty here to the charges and should desire to withdraw from the Senate they would seat him anyhow.

Mr. President, what is the Senate of the United States? It is an important national institution vested with vast powers. It approves every appointment of importance which the President of the United States makes; it must place the stamp of its approval upon the members of the Cabinet, who direct the operations of the departments of this Government. The Senate of the United States must approve the appointment of Federal judicial officers in every State in the Union; the Senate of the United States must approve the appointment of every member of the Supreme Court; the Senate has the power and authority to impeach Federal judges of the United States, including justices of the Supreme Court; the Senate of the United States has the power to impeach the President of the United States; the Senate has the power to initiate all legislation, except bills raising revenue; the Senate has the power to veto every measure passed by the House of Representatives.

The Senate of the United States must ratify all treaties with foreign nations, and, therefore, has much to do not only with shaping the destiny of 100,000,000 people but with the affairs of the whole world. Yet this afternoon some of us are battling as we have been day after day until we are worn and weary, trying to defend this body against influences of all kinds which have been brought to bear in the effort to seat Mr. Newberry. I have never witnessed such a campaign as the present one since I have been in Congress. Social lobbies have been active, as was pointed out by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. They have worked and worked and worked; they have besieged Members of the Senate at social functions and elsewhere. We are told that even the administration has taken a hand; in fact, the rumor is that the President has sent for Senators. We heard on yesterday that a certain Senator was sent for, but that he sent word to the President that his mind was made up and that he was going to vote against Mr. Newberry. I do not know how true that is; but I know that we have a solemn duty to perform in this hour.

Our soldiers never faltered on the fields of France, and I pray God that we shall not falter in our duty here to-day. They were fighting against autocracy and military despotism; fighting to preserve our liberties, and we are called upon to fight against the corrupt power of predatory wealth in the politics of America—the sale of seats in the United States Senate. The issue is plain. On which side do you battle? Are you on the side of your country, which means clean politics, the protection of the ballot, the honor and integrity of this body, the rights and liberties of the American people, or are you on the side of the man who procured his seat in the Senate by the corrupt use of money?

Senators, we are told that the Roman Emperor Vespasian made his peremptory command on a Senator to give his vote against the interests of his country and threatened him with immediate death in case he spoke the least word in favor of the other policy. The intrepid patriot, conscious that through his prevailing influence there was a chance of saving the people of Rome from utter ruin, answered the emperor with a smile:

"Did I ever tell you I was immortal? My virtue is at my own disposal; my life, I know, is at yours. Do, then, what you will; I shall do what I ought. If I fall in the service of my country, I shall have more triumph in my death than you with all your laurels."

Senators, what happened to Rome? She fell down among her beautiful hills and died. Money, the corrupt use of money in politics, overthrew the Roman Empire.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] reminded you in your last national convention that certain Republican candidates were trying to buy the nomination for President. If they can buy seats in this body, and the Senate approves and confirms the sale, the day is not far distant when they will buy the office of President. There are certain predatory interests in this country seeking to control the Government.

Senators, we owe it to the oath that we took, to the honor of the Senate, and the good of the country to stand firm here to-day. Let us refuse to permit anyone with bought credentials to have and hold a seat in this body. Let us make no exceptions. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] offers a resolution that condemns Mr. Newberry, condemns his committee, condemns the band of money marauders that roamed the State of Michigan buying voters, and yet I got the impression that my good friend from Ohio was going over and would vote to seat Mr. Newberry.

I hope and pray that he will vote against him; but if he votes for him in the face of that declaration, it is precisely like telling a man, "What you did to steal this horse is reprehensible, it brands you as a criminal, and you deserve the scorn and contempt of everybody, but you may keep the horse."

What is the magic power of this siren song that is luring Senators over to the Newberry side? I repeat, has this man contributed so much money to the Republican campaign fund that you dare not unseat him? Has Wall Street demanded that you seat him? Senators, what was it at Verdun that saved Paris for months and months when the Crown Prince battered at her gates? It was the unfaltering and intrepid spirit of the French soldier, who faced danger and death, exclaiming all the while, "They shall not pass!" The French soldier, stricken down, the light of battle still gleaming in his eye, lisping with his last breath, "They shall not pass!" And they did not pass. Our boys said the same thing at Chateau-Thierry, and they did not pass.

Let us reconsecrate ourselves to-day at the altar place of this Senate and say to every man in the Republic, Democrat or Republican, who seeks to come to the Senate by the lavish and unlawful use of money, "You shall not pass!"

Mr. President, in Lord Byron's poem on Cain, he tells us that Cain sought to learn the mysteries of death, and, following Lucifer from place to place, suddenly Lucifer led him from under the starry sky out into a realm where there was no ray of light, and immediately Cain, ill at ease and horrified, cried out to Lucifer—

> It is dark! It is dark! The stars are gone!

I ask you to-day, Senators, and I ask the people of the Republic, whose Senate this is: Are the stars of the faithful guardianship of the Senate's honor and integrity gone out of the firmament of this Chamber? Shall we permit the power of the purse to poison the life of the Republic, and principle and patriotism to perish in the country? God forbid.

Senators, let us do our duty to-day, and protect the honor and integrity of the Senate and safeguard the rights of the American people. If the Republic is to live, Newberry and those like him who buy seats in this body must not be permitted to cross the threshold of the Senate of the United States.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I hope we may vote. I am not going to delay the vote as far as I am concerned. I hope we will soon write the last chapter in this miserable farce.

All over the country in the last campaign we read upon the billboards, in great letters: "Let us quit wiggling and wabbling"; and that was what we charged the Democratic Party with. If there ever in all the history of the world has been such a spectacle of wiggling and wabbling as there is in this case right now, I should like to have anybody produce the record; and this is the Senate of the United States!

We are asked here to support a proposition writing our own infamy; that this election was against sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of free government, and yet to seat the man; and the gentlemen who have done the wiggling and wabbling have now found a cyclone cellar where they think they can go and escape the wrath and the tornado of an indignant public opinion.

We are told by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] that his resolution will express some policy in campaign expenditures. We have a policy expressed in the $10,000 limit that both Houses of Congress voted, and that was flagrantly violated in this Michigan campaign. What more policy do we want? When five or six years from now some one presents himself here with a certificate and an acknowledged expenditure of $500,000, will we write another policy then, and say: "We seat the man. It is destructive of free government, and yet we swallow our conscience and say for the future that no such sum shall be spent. It is all right in this case."

Oh, what a farce! I should like to see Senators stand up and vote one way or the other. I hold no brief for Truman Newberry, but I do respect him, and I believe he has courage. I think if he had the time he would come into this body and denounce this thing of giving him his seat and still saying that his primary campaign was destructive of free government.

Great God! What are we trying to do? Do you think he wants a seat under those circumstances? Do you think he wants to go through the years to come with infamy written upon his election because Senators here are afraid to face the issue?

They say they have been threatened in their seats. I have heard very little of threats. I said the other day that this case would go to a higher court, the people. That is not a threat. Is it a threat to a Senator in this Chamber to take his record to the people? How many Senators on this side will go to the people in the campaigns and say: "Read my record. I am not ashamed of it. I stood for the proposition that any amount of money could be expended to buy a seat in the United States Senate, provided the candidate did not know it. That is my platform, ladies and gentlemen. I am proud of it"?

Take the issue to the people. There are no threats in that. You ought to be proud of it, if that is what you stand for. Go to the people and tell them that. Tell them that Newberry did not know anything about this in the face of this record of agents spending the money for him—a record under which he would be responsible in law for the acts of Cody and the acts of King. Tell them, though, "I have studied the record. I say to you, my friends, that he did not know what was going on; and I am firmly of the belief, and it is a part of my political platform which I present to you with enthusiasm, that any man's friends can spend a million dollars to secure for him a seat in the Senate of the United States, but if he did not know it he is entitled to hold that seat. He can go to Europe, he can go up in a flying machine or a balloon, and know nothing about it."

Ah, what a farce! I wonder if you will tell them that. I wonder if you will tell them that you voted practically that the $195,000 spent as Mr. Newberry admits it was spent was wrongly spent. It is against public policy, it lessens the dignity of the Senate. My God! You never can lessen the dignity of the Senate after to-day. It is destructive of free government, but you voted for it because you were afraid to face the issue.

Truman Newberry would not do it. He does not want this seat under any such circumstances. Let us have the vote on the square issue. He is entitled to this seat and to be cleared and exonerated, or if what is said in this carefully contrived, wiggling, and wabbling amendment is true, he takes it with a cloud upon it.

I wish I had the time to read what great Senators in the past have said on the subject of corruption in elections. I have several such speeches before me. They did not wiggle and wabble; they met the issue.

Let any man take the speech of the great Senator from Maine, Senator Frye, in the Payne case. He pictured what this kind of corruption meant. Or take the speech of the other Senator from Maine, bearing the name of Hale, who, at the close of Senator Root's speech in the Lorimer case, uttered some thoughts about corruption in elections.

Take what Senator Frelinghuysen in the old days, during the consideration of the Pomeroy case, said about corruption in elections, and what Senator Hoar said. Read it. I have Senator Hoar's speech here, too, and that great, wise statesman from Massachusetts pointed out the perils to this Republic from the corruption of elections. Where are the voices now from that great section of this country, made immortal by those statesmen who raised their voices against corruption in elections?

Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said this resolution as now formed does not disgrace Mr. Newberry. Maybe not, but it disgraces the Senate of the United States vastly more than it disgraces Mr. Newberry.

I have a letter here from a traveling man of my State about this case, and if Senators think the people of the United States are not studying this case as they have studied few things they are mistaken. He said in this letter:

> The slogan of our business and the slogan of every commercial house is, "Keep it clean."

That is the motto we ought to write above the doors of the United States Senate, "Keep it clean," as a great part of this Government, and if we do not keep it clean ourselves the people will see that it is kept clean. You are not going to write above the doors here, "These seats are for sale."

Justice Miller, one of the greatest justices who ever sat upon the Supreme Court bench, at one time said that the two greatest dangers to the Republic were open, external violence and insidious corruption. The latter is just as bad as the former, perhaps worse.

I see a predecessor of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] in the Senate Chamber at this time, Senator BURTON. I have his speech in the Lorimer case before me and intended to read a part of it to the Senate, showing where he stood, noble and honest soul that he was, standing for an absolutely uncorrupted electorate.

Justice Miller was right, and when external violence threatened this country 5,000,000 men massed to go out and fight for this country. Make no mistake; when insidious corruption threatens this country, as it does now, with the Senate writing its infamy into this resolution, there will be millions of people with the same courage and with the same love of country who will mass to fight corruption. That is no threat; it is the statement of a fact.

Thank God for the folks at home! Thank God for the men and women in the factories and on the farms and around the firesides of this country who will eventually determine this question! I do not care how it is determined here. I know how it will be determined. I know they have been gathered in; they are ready to sign the directed verdict. Sign it in your infamy!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

Mr. SPENCER. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the resolution the following:

> And, therefore, Truman H. Newberry is not entitled to a seat in the United States Senate.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk called the roll.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. The Senator from Kentucky was called from the city last night. If present he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW]. If the Senator from Wyoming were present he would vote "yea" on the pending amendment.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. If the Senator from Missouri were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. If present and not paired the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] would vote "nay," the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] would vote "nay," and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] would vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. My colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on official business.

So Mr. NORRIS's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which the Secretary will report for the information of the Senate.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Strike out all after the word "Resolved," in line 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That Henry Ford, contesting the election of Truman H. Newberry as United States Senator from the State of Michigan for the term commencing March 4, 1919, not having received a majority of the votes cast at the election, is not entitled to a seat in this body.

Resolved further, Considering that it is against a sound public policy that huge sums of money should be spent for the nomination or election of a candidate for the United States Senate, and that such excessive sums were spent to secure for Truman H. Newberry the Republican nomination as such candidate for the State of Michigan at the primary election in that State for the term mentioned, and considering that the campaign for his nomination was conducted in gross and flagrant violation of the laws of the State of Michigan and in contravention of the statutes of the United States, he was not duly elected and is not entitled to a seat in this body.

Mr. OWEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and the reading clerk called the roll.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT];

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW]; and

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES].

If the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] were present he would vote "yea," and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] would vote likewise.

Mr. CURTIS. Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I wish to announce that on this question the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] would vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] is absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 46, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Montana in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] as modified.

Mr. ASHURST. Let it be read.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the resolution may be read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The resolution as modified reads as follows:

Resolved (1), That the contest of Henry Ford against Truman H. Newberry be, and it is hereby, dismissed.

(2) That Truman H. Newberry is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1919, and is entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States.

(3) That whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended.

The expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

Mr. OWEN. I submit the following substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the substitute proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Strike out all after the word "Resolved," in line 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That Truman H. Newberry is not entitled to a seat in this body because his relatives and friends, against a sound public policy, confessedly expended approximately $200,000 at the primary election to acquire the nomination for him, and because such a precedent would be harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate of the United States and contrary to the best interests of the United States Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when the name of Mr. WATSON of Georgia was called). My colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on official business.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I announce the following pairs, as on the preceding vote:

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], who would vote for, with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], who would vote against the substitute;

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], who would vote for, with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], who would vote against the substitute; and

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who would vote for, with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who would vote against it.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. KING called for the yeas and nays.

So Mr. SPENCER's resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

WITHDRAWALS AND RESTORATIONS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the withdrawals and restorations of public lands under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawals of public lands in certain cases," approved June 25, 1910, for the year ended November 30, 1921, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock meridian.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 16, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 12, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. WALSH, as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we would wait in a reverent hush for that guidance which Thy Spirit alone imparts. Teach us that goodness earns its own reward and that its highest object is man and its greatest service is love. O make our lives sacrificial that our work may be noble. Lead us to a thoughtful understanding that strength is the splendor of life only when it stoops to weakness, and wisdom is the might of divinity only when it parts the veil of ignorance. May truth and purity hold their white and stainless dominion over us. Always inspire our lips to declare their message and forbid that they should utter Thy holy name only at the sacred altar of the soul. For the sake of Jesus our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 77) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forest, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. MYERS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE PATENT OFFICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the House adjourned yesterday the previous question had been ordered on the bill (H. R. 7077) to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, to final passage. The question is on the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Stafford amendment that would deprive the employees——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, never mind, the gentleman has sufficiently described the amendment. It is not subject to debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California demands a separate vote upon the Stafford amendment. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the Stafford amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"That the provisions of section 6 of the act of March 3, 1921, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, shall not apply to any of the employees whose compensation is fixed by this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and, on a division, demanded by Mr. BLANTON, there were—ayes 10, noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion to recommit by Mr. BLANTON:

Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Patents with instructions to reframe same to conform to the limitations prescribed in the Lehlbach classification bill heretofore passed by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken and on a division, demanded by Mr. BLANTON, there were—ayes 13, noes 73.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote, because it shows there is no quorum present; and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present and objects to the vote. It is clear that there is no quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 44, nays 306, answered "present" 1, and not voting 79, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 198, noes 36.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. LAMPERT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9859, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentelman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9859——

Mr. SLEMP. And pending that motion——

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The points of order have already been reserved.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that the debate be limited.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I will state that I have requests for two hours and a half. That does not include any time I might take myself in explaining the bill.

Mr. SLEMP. Can the gentleman get along with a couple of hours on that side if we cut our requests down to that amount?

Mr. SISSON. We could, I think, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman could manage to make arrangements to give me about 30 minutes.

Mr. SLEMP. I am not sure that that can be done, but we are willing to do that.

Mr. SISSON. I will say to the chairman of the committee that I have no desire to take time unnecessarily. These gentlemen really want to make speeches, but not all of them on the bill. I understand that we will consume practically the balance of the day anyway, and I suppose that along the latter part of the afternoon, if we should find we have not accommodated all of our friends, we might by unanimous consent extend the time.

Mr. SLEMP. I think we can get along with two hours on this side.

Mr. SISSON. I will try that, Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that there will be no objection in the time left on the shank of the evening to getting unanimous consent to extend it somewhat.

Mr. SLEMP. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to four hours, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to four hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Mississippi. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STEVENSON, for to-day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LANHAM, for to-day, on account of illness.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9859, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9859, with Mr. SANDERS of Indiana in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9859, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for two hours.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee on appropriations, to whom was referred the Post Office appropriation bill, began work immediately on the reassembling of Congress the early part of December and continued their labors practically without intermission until this week, when we are reporting the bill to this committee. It is the largest bill in point of money that will be presented to Congress. It has in its service a number of employees greater than exist in the entire personnel of the Army and Navy of the United States combined. It is a service that reaches every home, every individual, and every business. It knows no discrimination as to race, color, religion, or condition of servitude. To do service is its motto. It operates through the dead hours of night; it is going when dawn steals over the earth as when night closes it in darkness. it defies wind, rain, storms, and blizzards. It is equally active in sunshine or in cold. With equal impartiality it brings all messages of hope, love, or news. It is a service of which the American people are proud, and without which, or even an impairment of which, our civilization would be thrown backward.

Contemplating the service from this standpoint, having the same enthusiasm for its personnel and its accomplishment as held by the men who are now conducting its affairs, the subcommittee began and pursued its investigations. The best of cooperation was shown by the gentlemen who appeared representing the department. This we are glad to report to this committee.

The bill as reported to the House subdivides itself naturally into the departmental or Post Office Department, the main seat of executive direction, and the field service, heretofore carried in two separate bills. There were a number of increases requested in departmental salaries, a great many of which, at least, and perhaps all, seem to be justified, but which are not recommended in view of the reclassification proposals now before Congress. The department requested 30 additional clerks here in Washington, but the committee did not deem it wise to concur in this recommendation inasmuch as part of the number requested was to provide for legislation not yet enacted into law and because, in reference to the remainder of the requests, one of the bureaus will doubtless be able to release a number of clerks equivalent to the additional number needed.

A glance at the number of employees in the Post Office Department for several years back does not indicate a growth in departmental personnel in strict relation to growth in field service. The committee feels confident that the present personnel will be able to take care of the business next year even if there is the expected increase in postal receipts. A similar situation does not, however, exist with reference to the field service. The business of the department has shown a steady growth, averaging as a rule about 100 per cent, or doubling every decade. Increased business carries with it necessarily increased expenses. The more stamps that are sold, the more letters and packages to be carried, more carriers to do collecting, more clerks to do distributing, more space in railroad cars to pay for, more carriers for delivery, and more supervisors to overlook the increasing personnel, and so forth, and on through all the ramifications of the service.

Increasing expenses necessarily attends growth of population, establishment of towns, of post offices, and postal facilities. Educational development of the people natually promotes reading and interchange of ideas, and therefore more mail to carry, and we would not have it otherwise. To perform this service in the most expeditious manner and at the lowest expense is the great problem of the Post Office Department.

In all the history of the Postal Service there has been a close relationship between postal receipts and postal expenditures. There has nearly always been an excess of expenditures over receipts, though never large. From 1837 to 1900 the expenditures over receipts reached $10,000,000 only three times in this period of 67 years, including both our Civil and our Spanish War periods. Since 1900 the difference between receipts and expenditures has not averaged $10,000,000 per annum, though exceeded in some years, while in other years an actual surplus seems to have been declared. I take it from all this record of nearly 90 years that the various Congresses and the various distinguished Postmasters General have striven to make this service largely self-supporting.

The reclassification acts of 1920 and subsequent acts and the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission increasing the compensation of railroads combined added about $70,000,000 to our annual expenditures. This makes it well-nigh impossible for the Postmaster General and his very able Assistant Postmasters General to balance receipts and expenditures and absorb in a short time so large an additional expense. If this $70,000,000 should have been deducted from this expenditure of 1921, the last year of Mr. Burleson's administration, the difference between receipts and expenditures would have been only about $11,000,000. Likewise if this $70,000,000 should be deducted from the estimated difference of $77,000,000 for the current fiscal year, there would be a difference only of $7,000,000, which would average well with the record of the department in all the years of its history.

The postal receipts for the first six months of the current fiscal year show some increase over receipts for the corresponding period of last year, but not very much. The turn for the better seems to have come in the latter part of October, but it is doubtful if we can expect the receipts for 1922 to represent the normal growth of 7 per cent for the entire year.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNBAR. I notice in the estimates that the village delivery service is reduced for the coming fiscal year from $1,500,000 to $1,300,000. Does this contemplate curtailment of the village delivery of mail?

Mr. SLEMP. If the gentleman will pardon me, the Post Office Department submitted an estimate of $1,500,000 for this service. The Budget Committee reduced that to $1,300,000. The annual rate of expenditure on this is $1,200,000. The number of applications on file not acted upon is 113. The number of cities that come within the regulation of the department is 2,079, of which 86 have gone to second class. The committee originally, I think, were unanimously in favor of having the Post Office Department estimates, the original estimates, of $1,500,000 to go on, but the matter was submitted to the full committee, and the full committee directed the matter to be submitted to the House with an amendment to be offered embodying $1,500,000. That will take care of the 113 applications on file now and give about 20 per cent increase. There are about 770 post offices having that delivery now, having one or two carriers each. The 86 offices there that are entitled to city delivery are being carried under the village delivery at a lower cost, probably $400 a man.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then I understand that an amendment will be offered so that it will not deprive any village now enjoying postal delivery service of that service which they have heretofore enjoyed?

Mr. SLEMP. Not only that, but it will take care of new applications for that service.

Mr. MANN. It does not take any amendment to take care of the existing service.

Mr. SLEMP. The existing service is more than taken care of by the surplus, and $1,500,000 will more than take care of the additional ones. This $1,500,000 will also take care of the increasing possibilities, because there are 2,000 cities eligible for the service.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has this service now become an established institution?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes. It is proposed to provide deliveries to towns of populations ranging from 1,500 to 2,500 and having postal receipts of $5,000, the theory being that outside of that the country people have the rural free delivery and the city people have the city delivery. It is a smaller service at a smaller cost.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand the gentleman's statement, hereafter all these cities will have that service?

Mr. SLEMP. There are only 700 of these towns having village delivery. This takes care of those applications on file, about a 20 per cent increase in number.

Mr. DOWELL. I know of a number of applications that were made that were turned down because the population was not sufficient.

Mr. SLEMP. They are holding it back down there and not spending the money that they have got.

Mr. DOWELL. It was understood to be refused because of lack of funds.

Mr. SLEMP. That situation will be remedied.

Mr. DOWELL. This will take care of that situation?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. UPSHAW. The gentleman is clear that it is not contemplated to cut off any town now receiving city delivery?

Mr. SLEMP. It does not curtail the post-office service in any particular at all. It does not take off anybody's salary, and it does not eliminate any permanent appointment, and makes no change or addition, and does nothing to anyone's salary except as is provided by law. It does not curtail the service in any way, but it even provides a possible leeway for additional business next year, and that applies to the village delivery and to everything else.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. On page 3 of the report it speaks of the total estimated expenditures being approximately $554,000,000, which would leave an estimated deficit for 1923 of $74,000,000. Will you explain why you start out with an estimated deficit?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes. As I say, for about 100 years the postal receipts and expenditures have run about even. The acts of 1921 added about $70,000,000 to our annual expenditures. It is difficult to absorb that. This fiscal year the receipts are not coming up to expectations. Instead of increasing normally they remain about the same. That is, the receipts for the first six months of this fiscal year differ only a few dollars from the receipts of the first six months of the last fiscal year. That leaves us a large deficiency to absorb this fiscal year. In other words, the receipts are not coming in to balance expenditures as expected.

I want to say right here that the department has met that situation in a very businesslike manner. They have curtailed expenditures this year out of 1922 appropriations about $24,000,000 and have taken care of the loss in postal receipts by the curtailment of expenses in the operation of the service.

Now, as to this $36,000,000 that the gentleman speaks of, it is based on the calculation that there will be a 7 per cent increase in the postal receipts in the remaining six months of this fiscal year and that there will be an increase in the next fiscal year of 9 per cent on the average over the postal receipts of the year 1922. Whether that is right or not I do not know. If it is only 6 or 7 per cent, then the difference between receipts and expenditures, technically called a deficit, will be about $50,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. Is not the 7 per cent increase taken into consideration in the estimate of $74,000,000 of deficit?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. Then when we make the statement that the bill is $26,000,000 less than it was, it does not mean so much when we are starting out with a deficit of $36,000,000.

Mr. SLEMP. We have a deficit of $77,000,000 this year. We hope to curtail the expenditures until the thing gets even again.

Mr. SNELL. If you started to-day with the general proposition to expect a deficit of that amount, will the department try to hold down expenditures?

Mr. SLEMP. I will say to the gentleman that this year in six months they have been able to return to the Treasury about $24,000,000, and if the postal receipts do not advance in the next six months we will have a reversion from this year's appropriation of $10,000,000 more. We have already returned $24,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. Then you think there is a possibility to get enough out of the postal receipts to pay for the expenses of the service?

Mr. SLEMP. No; we do not this year.

Mr. SNELL. Then why should not the full appropriation be made at this time?

Mr. SLEMP. We carry that provision in the bill appropriating the entire amount of money in excess of whatever is necessary outside of the postal receipts. That provision is now in the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I do not see the object.

Mr. SLEMP. Nobody knows what the amount will be.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, I wish to say that the deficit will depend entirely upon the revenues. Nobody can tell what the revenues will be.

Mr. SNELL. Is it taken into consideration that there will be an increase of 9 per cent in the revenues?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. They are not increasing to that degree this year.

Mr. MADDEN. No. We have cut $25,000,000 off the estimates to meet possible conditions that may arise, to which the gentleman alludes.

Mr. SNELL. You have cut that off the estimates, but your committee in your report said you will spend more.

Mr. MADDEN. You can not tell what the revenue will be.

Mr. SNELL. You say that even with the 9 per cent increase you will have $24,000,000 deficit.

Mr. MADDEN. That has been the case since the Post Office Department was created.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP] to say just a moment ago that last year was the only time that we had a very large deficit.

Mr. MANN. Is not this the simple solution? The cost of operation of the department is greater than it was a year ago.

Mr. SLEMP. Absolutely.

Mr. MANN. The postage rate has not been increased.

Mr. SLEMP. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. While the cost of operation has been increased.

Mr. SLEMP. We added $72,000,000 to the cost of operation in the last two years.

Mr. SNELL. I am not disputing that; but I understood the gentleman to say that up to last year there had not been any great deficit.

Mr. SLEMP. Congress passed a reclassification act for the Post Office Department increasing everybody's salaries, and then the Interstate Commerce Commission's decision came in, adding as a total $70,000,000 more to the expense of operating the Railway Mail Service.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that. We can not get away from that. My question is, Why should we not appropriate as nearly as we can a sufficient amount to pay the expenses, without estimating a deficiency?

Mr. SLEMP. We do.

Mr. MANN. We have to appropriate a year in advance.

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is the truth about it. We estimate what the receipts will be, based upon the past. It is a guess, as it always is.

Mr. SNELL. Surely I appreciate that, but my question is, when we are pretty sure there is going to be a deficit, why should we not come nearer to meeting it? Perhaps I may be wrong about that.

Mr. MANN. They have got to perform the service anyway.

Mr. SNELL. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. MANN. It costs more to perform the service than it did before.

Mr. SNELL. Agreed.

Mr. MANN. If you want to pay the cost of operation out of the postal receipts, you have got to raise the postage rate; and I do not think anyone here wants to do that.

Mr. SNELL. We are absolutely agreed on that. My only question was, why we should leave so much of a deficit to start with?

Mr. MANN. We do not leave it to start with. It is an estimate.

Mr. SNELL. The whole thing is an estimate.

Mr. MANN. I say the estimate is that there will be a deficit. We do not have any deficit to begin with for that year, because we have not reached that year yet; but based upon the probable receipts and the probable cost of operation the committee estimate that there will be a deficit of $34,000,000. I think it will be more.

Mr. SLEMP. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SNELL. That is the point. When we believe there will be a deficit, I do not think we should flatter ourselves that we are cutting down expenses.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield for a question?

Mr. SLEMP. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I just want to ask two questions: First, we have a definite amount appropriated for the service for the coming fiscal year. Then the revenues may measure up to and possibly go beyond that amount, but usually not. If the appropriations total $250,000,000 and the revenues are $225,000,000, there will be a diffrence of $25,000,000 between authorized expenditures and receipts. Then the provision ordinarily follows that that $25,000,000 shall be paid out of the general fund of the Treasury, and in that way the total amount of authorization will be covered by actual appropriations.

Mr. SLEMP. That is correct.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. DUNBAR. You estimate a deficiency in the Post Office Department for next year of $34,000,000?

Mr. SLEMP. Personally I think the gentleman from Illinois is correct about that, and that there will be a greater difference than that, but I am only giving you the maximum expectancy of the Post Office Department, which is a 7 per cent increase during the remaining six months of this year and a 9 per cent increase beyond the amounts of this fiscal year next year, and that is larger than the normal increase as measured throughout the years.

Mr. DUNBAR. What is your estimated deficit for the present fiscal year?

Mr. SLEMP. The figures given by the department estimate it to be about $70,000,000.

Mr. DUNBAR. How much was it last year?

Mr. SLEMP. Technically $157,000,000, but you should subtract that from the back pay to the railroads that was chargeable to previous years, over $70,000,000, leaving approximately $80,000,000 deficit.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then the deficit in the appropriation for the Post Office Department is being reduced?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; I should say that was generally true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SLEMP. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. There are a number of villages and towns that have made application for free delivery.

Mr. SLEMP. Village delivery.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. In the event that these applications are granted by the Post Office Department does this bill make provision for the payment for such service?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; it makes provision for the payment for the service for every one of those that have applied and for some more in addition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. For those that are pending also?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; for those that are pending. That is correct.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GORMAN. On the subject of the expected deficit, the explanation so far given is not clear to my mind. If you anticipate a deficit of $34,000,000 and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] predicts that it will be even greater than that——

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; I agree with him.

Mr. GORMAN. Is not that an open invitation for the introduction of deficiency appropriation bills in violation of the budgetary principle?

Mr. SLEMP. They can not tell what it is going to be, and that has been the uniform experience.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, it is customary to carry in the appropriation bill a provision that if the receipts of the Post Office Department are not sufficient the amount over and above that shall be paid out of the funds in the Treasury by warrant on the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SLEMP. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. That is included.

Mr. MANN. It does not provide for any deficiency bill.

Mr. SLEMP. That is carried on page 19 of this bill.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. I will.

Mr. DENISON. What disposition has the committee made in this bill for the care of the air mail service?

Mr. SLEMP. The air service was eliminated by the full committee although recommended by the subcommittee.

Looking briefly at the bill itself, the appropriations range around the offices of the various Assistant Postmaster Generals, by whom the manifold activities of the field service are administered. The Postmaster General retains the inspection force of which there is no increase requested, and has transferred to him the postal savings division, with the purpose of securing the cooperation of the postmasters of the country in this important work in a more active way. The transfer involves no additional expense and is purely administrative. Two important branches have been transferred from the First Assistant's office, one the mail messenger service to the Second Assistant's office and the other the motor transport service to the Fourth Assistant's office. This is also administrative and without additional expense to the Government. It is believed that better coordination in these activities with other branches of the service will thus be secured.

The total estimates considered by the committee amounted to $580,735,066. The amount recommended to be appropriated is $554,064,375, or a reduction from the estimates of $26,670,691. Of this reduction approximately $2,000,000 represents the elimination of the air service. The expenditures for this air service had been gradually reduced, all routes eliminated except the transcontinental one from New York to San Francisco, and the department undoubtedly was making splendid progress in demonstrating the feasibility of mail transportation by air in regard to safety, certainty of service, and reduction of expenditures, but as this is more related to airplane development than to carrying the mails the full committee eliminated the item from the bill. Had it been presented it would have been subject to a point of order. The chief remaining reductions were in the services administered by the First and Second Assistants, the largest item being $9,000,000 in railway mail pay. The annual rate for which this service is being carried now is $82,000,000, and the forceful and attractive Second Assistant Postmaster General believes by the most careful consideration of the space problem, checking it wherever needed, and filling to capacity the space paid for, studying the routing of mails, that this economy can be effected and provide for increased postal business also. He has brought about large economies in the mail messenger service turning back to the Treasury several millions this year and promising fine results for next year.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman has stated that the deficit of the present year will be $70,000,000 and the previous year it was over $80,000,000. It has been stated that the expense for operation has greatly increased, and the gentleman has pointed out where savings have been made. Can the gentleman tell us definitely where some of the big increases in expenses has been that created the deficit?

Mr. SLEMP. That is simple. The reclassification act of 1921 and the Steenerson Act and the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission added $70,000,000 to the annual expenditure. Deducting that from what we got you will see the difference between the actual receipts and expenditures is about what it has always been. The department has not been able to absorb the $70,000,000 in that short time.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, the department is handling a good deal of work below cost. There has been talk about an increase for the Parcel Post Service.

Mr. SLEMP. I will say that we have no way of getting information on that subject except an estimate secured from the amount of fourth-class mail. The receipts on that, I think, are about $144,000,000. They took away the special parcel post stamp, and so they do not know whether the stamps go on letters or on fourth-class matter. They have no stamps at the present time to check up the amount of parcel-post business. But they state that they have authority to have the Postmaster General submit the matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission for determination without carrying it to Congress at all and he can bring it to the Interstate Commerce Commission when he is in position to state the facts.

Mr. SNYDER. It must be conceded that if the normal expense of the department is going to stay where it is and the receipts are not sufficient, some arrangement should be made to bring the receipts up to the outgo. I think that this is one of the departments that the public is willing to pay for the service.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me, I would like to say that a large part of the increase was caused by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase the railroad pay rate about 35 per cent, causing the appropriation for that purpose to go up from $70,000,000 to $96,000,000 a year. It must be remembered by everybody here that in the last two years the legislation increasing the compensation of the men in the Postal Service added $115,000,000 a year to the pay.

Mr. SNYDER. I thank the gentleman for the information, and that is what I am trying to get into the RECORD.

Mr. SLEMP. That is what brought it about, and the department has not been able to absorb the additional increase.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. What provision is going to be made to take care of the air mail service?

Mr. SLEMP. I can not answer that. That was simply an auxiliary service. It was to take the mail that did not go on the train at night the next morning. Of course, it will go on the regular railway schedule.

Mr. GORMAN. It practically abolishes the air mail service.

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; that is the effect of it.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. The gentleman might state that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is considering legislation along this line which may permit the Government to contract with private parties to carry the mail by air. The Post Office Department is negotiating with people who demand rapid transmission to see if they are not willing to pay a little larger postage rate for this service. Between the Post Office Department and these people they are trying to work out a substitute for the air mail service.

Mr. SLEMP. I thank the gentleman for his statement. The reason that the subcommittee carried this was to demonstrate the commercial possibilities of this service.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. I will.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Has the gentleman's committee any information as to what the air mail service costs?

Mr. SLEMP. No; you have the same stamps for that service that you have for the ordinary mail business. I can give the gentleman the number of letters and the number of miles covered by the air mail planes.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Has the gentleman any figures as to what it actually costs?

Mr. SLEMP. No; but taking everything—the number of employees, the overhead, the upkeep, the gasoline, the rent of the fields—it costs $5.50 per ton as against 11 cents per ton.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. I will.

Mr. ARENTZ. Something has been said about it being a needless expense.

Mr. ROSSDALE. It seems that way to me.

Mr. ARENTZ. Travel through the air must be improved, and the only way it can be improved is to travel through the air. If we are not going to subsidize commercial companies to travel through the air, the Government must do the service.

Mr. ROSSDALE. It would appear to me that that would properly be the function of either the War or the Navy Department, or both.

Mr. ARENTZ. England and France and Italy are subsidizing commercial air service. I think the United States Government should do the same thing.

Mr. ROSSDALE. In these days of economy and retrenchment we ought not to experiment needlessly.

Mr. SLEMP. The evidence before the committee is that they are bringing the cost down rapidly and demonstrating just what the gentleman from Nevada contends.

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I notice in appropriating for the amount for railroads there is a decrease of $10,000,000. I thought that was one of the items that had gone up.

Mr. SLEMP. The rate of expenditure is $82,000,000 at which that service is being performed now, and, according to the Second Assistant Postmaster General, that has run along as an average. He says that he is crowding these cars so as to get more mail in a particular space. Then he is supervising the determination of the amount of space, because any vacant space must be paid for. Then he is studying the routing of mails, so that it goes between two points on the shortest line.

Mr. SNELL. Then, by increased efficiency in the Post Office Department he hopes to keep it down and carry it for the $86,000,000 appropriated?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; and he has turned back $11,000,000 to the Treasury for this fiscal year.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I notice an item on page 12 for village delivery service.

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Is it the purpose to restore the old appropriation?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes. The principal other changes in the bill relate to the first assistant's office, or rather to the activities under him. The activities in this bureau are so complex and so diversified, of such large personnel, that one reaches a conclusion with much difficulty. As a general thing, we followed closely the desires of this able and hard-working official. He is now engaged in a far-reaching survey of the various branches of the service, and promises much in efficiency of service and economy of operation. He is handicapped by not having at his command a sufficient number of inspectors to do what he would like to do. In this connection I would call the attention of the committee to this situation, because there is a curtailment there in expenditure of about $11,000,000 in the activities coming under the First Assistant Postmaster General. Nearly all of that is based on what the department itself thinks they can do the work for, such as temporary and auxiliary clerk hire, where we have cut off $1,000,000. That was agreeable to the department. Rent, light, heat, and fuel were more or less a mathematical calculation of what they are doing now with an annual rate, and also the number of rent items that would come in the next year; so we are justified in that. The only one, perhaps, that we had any doubt about was for temporary clerk hire, from which we cut off $4,000,000, whereas the department wanted us to cut off only $1,000,000.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I have not had an opportunity to read the bill, but does it provide for a continuation of guards for mail cars?

Mr. SLEMP. There is no provision carried in the bill for that, and there is no expense attached to the Post Office Department for the performance of that service, since it is more or less based on an informal request from the Postmaster General for assistance from the marine service, and he is using marines who would otherwise perhaps be at some camp. What the policy of the Postmaster General is upon that is to be determined by a conference, understood to take place shortly between the Secretary of the Navy and the Postmaster General. They have about 2,000 people engaged in that service now, and it is rapidly being curtailed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Is not that service costing the Post Office Department anything?

Mr. SLEMP. No.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I understand they are marines, but what about their maintenance?

Mr. SLEMP. We tried to find that out. There may be some small miscellaneous expense there for maintenance, but it is very little. There is no appropriation carried for it in the bill for next year.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The gentleman does not know whether it is the understanding that it will be the policy to continue this?

Mr. SLEMP. The understanding is that they are going to get rid of that as rapidly as possible. In other words, the Postmaster General acted under an emergency. A number of robberies were taking place and the department itself did not have the force and the Department of Justice did not have the force. The Postmaster General did the wise thing. He acted quickly and got hold of a force from another place and put them on the trains to stop the robberies.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says there is no appropriation for that this year? Is it not the policy now to take the marines off the trains——

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; I just stated that.

Mr. MANN. And add to the number of inspectors the same number of people for the Post Office Department, and guard the mail between the post offices and the trains?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes. I would say to the gentleman that the policy of the Post Office Department has not been completely worked out on that, so that we can make any definite statement in respect to it.

Mr. MANN. Are they not still endeavoring to guard the mails, at least between the stations and the post offices?

Mr. SLEMP. They are still attempting to guard the mails, with a diminishing force.

Mr. MANN. By a force from the Post Office Department?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes. They are increasing that and diminishing the other.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, referring to the matter of guarding the mails, has the gentleman any information as to whether the guarding that has been provided under this emergency has been effective in reducing the number of robberies?

Mr. SLEMP. They claim that it has been effective in reducing them, but, of course, we can not give any figures on that, because we would not know.

Mr. KETCHAM. I thought there might be some report of robberies which have taken place since and a comparison with those that took place before the guards were put on.

Mr. SLEMP. I would say that the Postmaster General in an emergency situation acted well and promptly.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, I saw a statement a short time ago emanating from the Post Office Department, though not from the Postmaster General, to the effect that there has not been any robbery at all of any consequence since that time.

Mr. SLEMP. Practically not; and prior to that time they lost millions of dollars through robberies, even in populous centers like New York City.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any provision in this bill for taking care of that situation?

Mr. SLEMP. That is being developed by the department, and, I will say, has not been fully worked out.

Mr. DOWELL. An appropriation has not been prepared for it?

Mr. SLEMP. No. There is no request for it.

Mr. ROSSDALE. How large an increase of employees does this bill make provision for that will guard the mails in first-class cities?

Mr. SLEMP. That is being worked out by the Post Office Department. This was a sort of epidemic of robberies, and they have not determined on a policy. They are gradually increasing their force of inspectors.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Might I ask how large an increase of postal employees—I mean regular employees, such as clerks, who will presumably guard these mails—is provided for in this appropriation bill?

Mr. SLEMP. Their report was that they looked to the postmaster's recommendation for the personnel for that business, and that under the item of clerks for offices and all that we allow an increase of about $3,000,000, part of which was to be taken up with work of this kind.

Mr. ROSSDALE. That will probably allow approximately about 2,000 clerks. But it would seem to me it would be necessary, as in the past, to use these temporary employees.

Mr. SLEMP. We have.

Mr. ROSSDALE. These robberies came from the use of such temporary employees.

Mr. SLEMP. We tried in this bill to give them the amount for temporary service that they want.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I was informed yesterday, or at least I thought I was, by the Post Office Department that the guarding of the mails now is not to be done by the marines but by people in the inspector's office.

Mr. SLEMP. I do not think that is quite their policy.

Mr. MANN. That is what I understood they said yesterday. It is what I thought they said.

Mr. DENISON. During the preceding administration, in the interests of economy, there were many changes made in the rural carrier system, reducing the length of routes, and there were a great many routes taken off in the interest of economy. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any information upon the question as to whether or not there was any real economy resulting from the changes in the rural-route system of the country? We know that people all over the country are very much dissatisfied with it, and now I am receiving applications almost every day asking for the original arrangements to be restored and for the routes to be somewhat shortened and more routes put in. Is there anything of that kind contemplated?

Mr. SLEMP. I will say to the gentleman that we did not consider it a function of our committee to go back and review the official acts of any previous administration, but we limited ourselves to the financial needs of the department for the coming year. And if the gentleman will give me his attention just a moment I will refer to the Rural Free-Delivery Service. I say that we did not consider it our function to go back and examine into the records of other administrations and their policies, and what they did, but we limited ourselves to the financial needs of the coming year. There were 600 applications on file in the department for new routes. Two hundred have been allowed this fiscal year, leaving 400 subject to investigation. We make provision for those to be granted if the department wishes to do it and if the public demand is for it. We make provision in this bill for an equal number next year, so that the continuation of the rural free delivery according to the wishes of the people is provided for in the bill if they meet the conditions.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I found also that during the last administration there were a great many railway mail clerks taken off and the distribution of mail en route was discontinued in many places and mail taken to distributing centers, where it was distributed. Do you know whether the present post office administration is attempting to make any effort to put back clerks that were taken off and reestablish the distribution of mail en route?

Mr. SLEMP. The Second Assistant Postmaster General stated in the hearings that he was attempting to do what the gentleman says.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The reason I ask it is, that I always believed the system of taking this mail to distributing centers was wrong; that it did not facilitate the rapid distribution of the mail.

Mr. SLEMP. The Second Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. O'Shaughnessy, stated clearly in the hearings that he agreed with the position which the gentleman from Illinois takes.

Mr. MANN. It cheapens the cost?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes, sir. Of course, that separation in the city is a matter of economy, because that is only a dollar-a-foot space instead of $4.

I would say right here that the Second Assistant Postmaster General is making a fine record, it seems to me.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman about that. I think so.

Mr. SLEMP. The recommendations we have made have been the best we could make and are the unanimous opinion of the subcommittee, who have at all times had in mind that the Government owed it to the people to render the best service possible at the lowest cost to the taxpayers.

I want to acknowledge my own personal indebtedness to my associates on the committee, Mr. OGDEN, of Kentucky, who had been a member of the previous committee, and whose services have been invaluable, and also the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. I do not think anything too good could be said about him. He was not assigned to this subcommitee at all, but was drafted from his other duties by the imperious courtesy of our distinguished chairman, Mr. MADDEN. He labored with us unceasingly to bring out the best possible bill. Beyond that, we acknowledge our indebtedness to our worthy chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who knows something of everything, even of the post office business. In all our difficulties he was our chief guide and support. [Applause.]

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I wish to ask the gentleman about that deficit. It was scaled down, down to $81,000,000. Was the deficit for the aerial mail taken into account as a part of that?

Mr. SLEMP. No. That was put in because the Interstate Commerce Commission added about $40,000,000 to the railway mail pay and the reclassification of salaries amounted to $30,000,000.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. That is accounted for?

Mr. SLEMP. It came in and could not be absorbed by the postal receipts.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. It is in the $81,000,000 deficit?

Mr. SLEMP. All these postmasters had their salaries increased, and the mail carriers had their salaries increased, and also the clerks; and then they have had automatic promotions and sick leave, and I do not know all they do have. Anyway, it adds on $70,000,000, including the extra pay to the railroads.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The Air Service is added?

Mr. SLEMP. That amounts only to about $2,000,000. That is eliminated from this bill.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Do you call that extraordinary?

Mr. SLEMP. No.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Considerable has been said concerning the deficit in this bill. Will the gentleman kindly explain the use of the word "deficit," as applied in this bill in contradistinction to the use of the word in the sense in which it is used in other bills?

Mr. SLEMP. It is intended to define the difference between postal receipts and postal expenditures. In a few years there has been a surplus. It is with satisfaction, however, that we note that while postal revenues have not increased as hoped for, the very able officials of the Post Office Department have met this situation in a business way and have reduced expenses by an amount equal to the falling off in postal receipts, and perhaps greater. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has consumed 72 minutes. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is recognized for two hours.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the House and the country are to be congratulated on the services which the chairman of this subcommittee has rendered. This is one of the most difficult bills in which to reduce estimates, because so much of the bill is made up of contracts which are fixed by law, and of fixed salaries, so that it is next to impossible to reduce the estimates much. But the chairman of this subcommittee has done some wonderfully effective work. His talent seems to run along the line of investigation, searching out points and places where you might save a little money. I think he has reported to the House as good a bill as law will permit and if the bill is not good it is not the fault of your chairman or the subcommittee, and I doubt extremely whether any additional dollars could well be saved beyond what is represented in this bill unless you change existing law. If there is any extravagance in this bill it is because Congress has put it there by enacting extravagant laws.

Prior to the taking hold of this matter by Congress the Post Office Department under Gen. Burleson was being run from year to year with some balances left in the Treasury from postal receipts. I do not think quite as much money has been saved as we were led to believe at one time, but the present financial officer, now the accountant under the Budget System, gives the following figures in reference to the amount saved:

In 1914 there was a surplus of $4,000,000, omitting the odd dollars. In 1915 there was a deficit of $11,000,000. In 1916 there was a surplus of nearly $6,000,000. In 1917 there was a surplus of $9,000,000. In 1918 there was a surplus of $64,000,000, but in that sum was included the war tax, and some $50,000,000 must be taken from that $64,000,000. There was a surplus of $73,000,000 in 1919, but that also included the war tax.

Now, Postmaster General Burleson, when he was in the House and after he became Postmaster General, insisted that the Postal Service should be made self-sustaining. Gen. Burleson did make it a little more than self-sustaining. But Congress, as soon as it found that there was a surplus, proceeded to add more than $75,000,000 in increased salaries in one sweeping sum, or approximately that, so that that not only wiped out any little surplus that Gen. Burleson had but left the incoming Post Office Department practically with a $70,000,000 or $75,000,000 deficit. This was done by the Republican House and Senate, and Gen. Burleson was helpless, just as the present Postmaster General is.

As to the operation of the automatic promotion system, that is difficult to determine, because some men entitled to promotion die and new ones take their places, and various transfers occur, so that the Post Office Department can not tell you with absolute certainty just exactly what the automatic promotions will be at the end of the year. But that will take several million dollars, and before the automatic promotions shall have ceased under the Steenerson bill of the Republican House and Senate the salaries in the Post Office Department alone will be increased something like $100,000,000. Of course, this is staggering in amount, especially when we get no additional service and no better service than before the increase.

Now, as suggested in this debate by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], there is absolutely no use in our speculating or figuring or talking about the Post Office Department running itself on the revenues unless one of two things happens: You have either got to increase the postal receipts—and that may be done by increasing the stamp rate—and if it is not done that way I do not see how you can increase it; and the other method is to decrease the expenses. I do not see how you can reduce expenditures unless Congress shall have enough courage to take the initiative and change the existing law in reference to salaries and compensation to railroads, and, of course, this Congress has no such courage.

Now, I am going to omit the establishment in Washington, although it is remarkable to see how rapidly the expense of the establishment in Washington has increased in the last few years, and it is also a remarkable increase when you look at the salary increase which Congress itself put on.

But take some of the items just as they come. I will mention postal cards. In 1915 the appropriation was $86,350. In 1923 the amount carried in this bill is $225,000. Of course, that is an item which may be affected somewhat by the increased number of postal cards used, but that does not account for that vast increase in cost. The amount is largely accounted for by the increase in price charged for each postal card.

Now, I want to run through the bill. Here is an item in the office of the chief inspector; that is, the inspection for the entire Postal Service. In 1912 the amount carried was $704,450. In 1922, the current year, it was $1,390,000, almost an increase of 100 per cent. Again, for compensation of clerks at division headquarters, in 1912, the amount appropriated was $99,000. In 1913 it was the same, and also in 1914, and in 1915 it was $134,000, until in this current year it has grown from 1912, $99,000, to $238,000.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I presume the gentleman does not take into consideration the fact that the growth of the country has made necessary an increased force of employees in that department. Has the gentleman taken that into consideration?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. I have taken that into consideration, but if the growth in the postal expenditures had been anything like that from 1912 down to the present time you would have added less than 12 per cent.

You can not add from 300 to 400 and in many instances 500 and 600 per cent, because the country has not increased in business or population that rapidly. In other words, I am endeavoring to call the attention of Congress and the attention of the country to the fact that when you pass bills like the one you passed here this morning, and when you pass bills like the Lehlbach reclassification bill, you are not serving the people at home, but you are increasing their burdens. If I thought that the increase in salaries would obtain more efficient service, then you could say that they were doing more work per man than they did under the old salaries, but that is not true. They do less per man than ever before in the Government. The Government pays more for what it gets than any other institution. You all know this to be true.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Is the gentleman aware that the Lehlbach bill does not apply to the Post Office Department?

Mr. SISSON. I am aware of that.

Mr. ROSSDALE. The gentleman evidently has reference to some other bill.

Mr. SISSON. I am talking about the Lehlbach bill and the bill that passed this morning.

Mr. ROSSDALE. But that does not apply to the Post Office Department. It expressly excepts the Post Office Department.

Mr. SISSON. I know that and everyone in the House knows that. I have never intimated that was not true. I am simply calling attention to those bills to show how Congress itself is the criminal, is responsible for all this extravagance. My God, if you are not satisfied you certainly ought to be with the increases in salaries in the Post Office Department. About the best office in the United States that I know of is that of rural or city carrier. I know they have got votes in my district and they have got votes in your district. I know this is a dangerous thing to talk about, but you have got to talk about somebody if you are going to reduce the expenses of the Government. The only question is, Have you the nerve and the courage to do it? You have not. Come clean with it. You know you have not.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Does the gentleman know how much it costs to live in New York and other large cities?

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman contend that these carriers are receiving too much money now for the service they perform?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe their pay should be cut?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. But both the city and rural carrier should be treated alike. The city carrier is paid higher now for what he does than the rural carrier. The city carrier is now paid too much.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman believes their pay should be cut below what they are now receiving?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. Why does not somebody else say it? Because the carriers have votes. It would be easy for me to say, "Yes; I think the carriers ought to have more money," and then go back and whisper in their ears and get their votes. What I want to say to you is that if the employees in this Government continue to increase in number much more, and if their organizations continue to increase so that they can inveigh against Congressmen to the extent that they are doing now, and multiply their influence in the matter of votes, you will not be able to get Congressmen who are capable and able and efficient enough and courageous enough ever to reduce governmental expenses.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Presumably the gentleman is aware what it costs to live in the large first-class cities? Presumably he knows, and that if the maximum pay of a carrier is $1,800, probably one-third of that has to go for rent.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman will have to revise his figures. They get more money than that.

Mr. ROSSDALE. In the city of New York one-third of that goes for rent alone. You can not get an apartment under $600 a year. These men must live within a radius of 10 or 20 miles of their post-office employment.

Mr. SISSON. I want to tell you about apartments in New York and everywhere else that I know of. They get just exactly what the trade can pay, no more and no less, and if the United States Government continues to increase salaries in Washington and in all of the large cities you will have rents going up accordingly. There is one thing about private pay; it can be reduced. You can cut that down, but when you get Government pay too high you can not reduce that.

Mr. ROSSDALE. But private pay is higher than Government pay.

Mr. SISSON. I do not believe a word of that, either. I have heard all that sort of stuff, but except a few specialized classes of people, I find they are mighty glad to give up their jobs at home and come with the Government—that is, the purely salaried people. You are always hearing that sort of "bunk," and it is pure "bunk." Not one of you but that knows that there are hundreds of people with what they call good jobs who will quit instantly for a Government job. Why? Because they know they will get higher pay, less hours, and less work than in private employment.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KETCHAM. If the gentleman's statement with reference to the high salaries paid rural letter carriers is true, will he kindly explain how it happens that there were 6,281 vacancies occurring in the rural letter carrier force during the fiscal year, of which 5,059 were due to resignations?

Mr. SISSON. Ah, at that time they could get more money; but more than 10,000 of them are trying to get back into the service now. Do not talk to me about that, because down in my district they were resigning, and one fellow sent his resignation in to me, and I wrote back and told him, "My dear boy, had not you better hold this a month or two?" He held it two or three months, and then he wrote me a long letter and said: "I never was as glad of anything in my life, because I now find that conditions on the farm are such that I can not make anything like what I thought I could, and this is the best job I know of right now." Oh, no; that will not do.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. If the gentleman's statement is true, how does he explain the fact that since the new administration came in, up to June 30, 1921, there were 1,665 vacancies?

Mr. SISSON. Those vacancies may occur pretty regularly all through the service. I do not know. I am not able to account for the reasons why men resign here and there, but let me ask the gentleman from Michigan, does he believe in these big salaries?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes; I do.

Mr. SISSON. All right; does he believe in the platform of his party that pledged reduction of expenses of the Government?

Mr. KETCHAM. I do, sir.

Mr. SISSON. Then how can you eat your cheese and keep it, too?

Mr. KETCHAM. If I were to reduce, I would say it would not be in the salaries of these men who carry a load of mail on their backs on days like yesterday, or those who travel country roads on stormy days like that.

Mr. SISSON. This is not a very good place to demagogue. The fine place to demagogue is right at home. We ought not to try to demagogue around here among these men who can give us cards and spades and out-demagogue both of us. I want to have the gentleman come right down to brass tacks. Now, how are you going to reduce the expenses of the Government?

Mr. KETCHAM. Did you ever carry the mail on these roads?

Mr. SISSON. I never did. I suppose the gentleman has.

Mr. KETCHAM. I have.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman has done that, but now he has gotten above all that, and now he is getting $7,500 a year.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Michigan is one of the resignations. [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. I thank the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Michigan is one of the resignations. And now to my question: Where are you going to reduce the expenses of the Government?

Mr. KETCHAM. I will certainly not try to reduce them by reducing the pay of these carriers.

Mr. SISSON. That does not answer my question. The gentleman's party is pledged to reduce expenses. Now, come across the line. I do not owe the gentleman's party anything, but I am trying to help reduce the expenses of the Government. Go and ask any man on the Appropriations Committee with whom I have served. I can give you some evidence of the faith that is in me. What evidence can you show that you have tried to keep your party pledge?

Mr. KETCHAM. When we begin the reduction of expenditures——

Mr. SISSON. Where are you going to begin?

Mr. KETCHAM. I deny that it is pure demagoguery.

Mr. SISSON. Denial does not make it so.

Mr. KETCHAM. But my denial is as strong as the gentleman's assertion.

Mr. SISSON. I will leave it to these Members here to say who is right about it. But the gentleman has not answered my question. Where are you going to begin?

Mr. KETCHAM. I will not begin here, will you?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I will. That is the way with you. You are willing to reduce away from home and where it will not affect you politically, but only the other fellow. But when you have to look the boys from your own district straight in the face you have not the courage to reduce. You are brave with the other fellow's voters but the reverse with your own. That is the trouble with the Government now. We need men, men of courage, men who their duties know and knowing will do.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GORMAN. I will suggest that we are going to start to reduce the Government expenses and the burdens on the taxpayers by cutting out the profligate and extravagant waste of the Democratic Party in making war contracts and by the world disarmament conference.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, well, let us see about that. Was the gentleman here during the war?

Mr. GORMAN. No; I was not.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman had been here he would have been a patriot. He would have discharged his duty. He would not have left the boys over in France without food and arms, but would have sent the money necessary to give them arms and munitions and food. He would have gone on the stump and said we were more patriotic than the Democrats. He would have been boasting of how he stood for President Wilson in this war and did everything that was necessary. He would have said, "I did everything in the war that I could. I did not measure the cost against the blood of the boys across the seas. No; I did not." But now the complexion has changed; you have come too late. It is an easy thing to say it now, but here is my good friend JOHN TILSON, my good friend JIM MANN, who are patriots, and all around them are patriots. Of course, they have got to stand up and stand hitched, because they voted for all these appropriations, but the gentleman from Illinois was not here and he did not do it and he does not have to answer to an intelligent constituency.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. No; I can not yield.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I have a question for the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. Well, let us have it.

Mr. ROSSDALE. And an answer. I will give you the question with the answer.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, well; I do not want that. The gentleman can not inject that into my speech, and if he tries to put it in I will cut it out. I do not want anybody to ask me a question and answer it himself. The gentleman can take his own time. [Applause.]

Now to go a little further. Here are the traveling expenses of the post-office inspectors. In 1912 the bill only carried $176,400. In 1922, the present current year, they carry $447,000. What about the taxpayer? He is staggering along with that. It is so easy here to increase compensation; it is so easy to hear the evidence for these increases, make a little different sound, one is aye and the other is nay, and you put the additional burden on the taxpayer. Take another item, the expenses of the division headquarters. In 1912 it was $5,000 and in 1922, the present year, it is $16,000, and so on through the bill.

Now, gentlemen, I am going to ask permission to put in the RECORD the figures showing how rapidly the Government's expenses have increased.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Gentlemen, I thank you for this permission. Before doing so, I want to say that I am placing these figures in the RECORD for the purpose of showing you and the taxpayers of America how their expenses for their mails have mounted higher and higher each year, and this department of Government is but a sample of all the others. I also want to say that unless there is a change, the Postal Service will have a deficit of nearer $100,000,000 than the $50,000,000 referred to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP], the chairman of the subcommittee. I also desire to say that the radical increase is not due to the Democratic administration of Gen. Burleson nor to the present Postmaster General, Gen. Hays. The enormous increase was fastened upon the country by the last Congress, which was Republican in both branches, and no one can tell where these automatic increases will end. Do not try to pass the fault on to others. This extravagance lies at the door of Congress. I think Gen. Burleson and Gen. Hays are both free from blame. They both alike would keep down extravagance and remove from the backs of the taxpayers every burden possible. Congress alone is to blame.

I trust every Member of Congress will study these figures and see what they mean to the taxpayer:

These figures are alarming to all men who love good government, it does not matter what their political faith. I have, since I have been a Member of Congress, devoted myself to the task of fighting extravagance. I know that I have accomplished something with the help of others. But while a few of us have tried to keep the greedy fingers out of the Treasury, others have been sleepless in their ingenuity to get money from the people and put it in their capacious pockets. Every man in this House knows that I have ever been on guard fighting every extravagance. But "the love of money is the root of all evil," and that love of money is ever manifesting itself here in Washington. The press is not in sympathy with economy in Government expense and those who control the policy of our great newspapers will not assist in giving the people the facts and assist in creating a sentiment throughout the country for economy. Give me the control of the press of the United States for six years and this Republic can be saved from bankruptcy, but at the rate we are going we will be more than bankrupt in six years.

Now, gentlemen, I want to make these remarks for the purpose of impressing upon the Members of Congress, if I can, the fact that we must economize. The safety of the Republic demands it. There is one way to economize, and only one way. There is only one way for you and me to economize in our expenses, and that is to deny ourselves many of the things that we think we greatly need. The Government can only economize in the same way.

CUT DOWN EXPENSES.

I want to make this statement, and let it stand out in bold relief in the RECORD, and I hope it will enter, if not into everybody's, at least into somebody's heart. I had rather be extravagant with my own funds than be extravagant with the public funds. I am afraid of the man that is penurious and stingy with his own money and lavish with the expenditure of the public money. I am afraid of the man who ruthlessly votes away the taxpayers' money but is himself careful of the expenditure of his own.

That sort of man is not to be trusted. What I fear is that we are getting to be entirely too free with public money; but there is back home now, while you are sitting quietly in this beautiful Chamber, a constituency behind you. Those on the farms are laboring and economizing, and those in the city, many of them, are trying to keep out of the reach of the sheriff. They are now complaining grievously about these burdens. The burden of taxation in the State is greater than it ever was before in the history of the country. Municipal taxes are greater, county taxes are greater, State taxes are greater. The burden is staggering to them. Added to that is the staggering burden of Federal taxes. The Federal Government now owes, in round figures, $25,000,000,000, and the interest on that has to be paid. We ought to be creating a small sinking fund each year to reduce the debt. That is good business.

In addition to this debt all other expenses have increased beyond bounds, as I have endeavored to show you. What are you doing to reduce expenses? What are you going to do? It will not be long, if the falling prices continue, if wages continue to go down—and the last statement I have seen is that there are now between five and six million people in this winter month looking for something to do—it will not be long if you take out of industry every dollar you can and you take out of the factories every dollar you can and out of agriculture every dollar you can and spend it in this Government for official salaries and clerk hire and in governmental activities until you will so greatly increase the burden upon the people that they can and will bear it no longer. The Government then becomes a curse and not a blessing. You may spend money if you will upon certain public works and in that way you may take from the rich a certain amount of money and give employment to people, but this remedy is only temporary; it will furnish no permanent relief. There never was a government that ever added to the wealth of a country by taxation. Let me lay down this proposition: No government ever made a whole people rich, but many governments have made people poor. No government ever created one cent of value. Governments are consumers of wealth and not producers of wealth. Governments can take from the masses that which they have created by their labor and give it to a few and make the few rich and the many poor.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman believe that we would have more faith in his argument if during the eight years the gentleman was a member of this committee and his party had a majority and control of the House he had used this argument to reduce the appropriations then made, rather than to criticize the appropriations now being made?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I find that my argument has fallen upon a stony place. My Democratic colleagues have many times become almost angry with me because I so repeatedly admonished them, because of items of extravagance, that they had no right to point the finger of scorn at the Republicans.

Gentlemen on this committee will recollect that I have never played politics with appropriations, and I hope to God I never shall. Let the gentleman ask Mr. WOODS or Mr. SLEMP or any of these men who have served with me in a confidential way on these subcommittees, and he will not find a single man but will tell him that I have given them my heart support as well as whatever mind support I have to reducing expenses under Democratic as well as under Republican Congresses. I am sorry that my argument has fallen on deaf ears. But none are so deaf as those who will not hear and none so blind as those who will not see. The gentleman also knows that I have always as I now do criticize extravagance. But to come back. Governments do not produce wealth. They are consumers of wealth. I will tell you what governments can do after wealth is produced. Governments can, by special law, take from one man and give to another, and governments, after wealth has been brought into existence, can tax directly and indirectly the property of the people and take it from one man and give it to another. Governments can transfer wealth, but they can not produce it. You know that God in His order, when He created the world and man was put out of the Garden of Eden, laid down the law of wealth, and from that day to this there has been but one way to create wealth, and that is by work, by labor, by toil. "Six days shalt thou labor." That is what produces the wealth of the country. It must be taken out of the ground by labor in the form of coal and minerals or it must be taken out of the soil by its cultivation, or it must be taken out of the sea. Wealth can not be brought into existence in any other way. After you shall have brought the raw material into existence, you may add to its usability by changing its form from raw material into the finished product for the use of mankind, but the basis of all wealth is the labor. All wealth is brought into existence by labor—work.

This Government makes a horrible blunder when it imagines that you do not finally reach the point in taxation beyond which you must not go. When you shall tax the labor that brings that wealth into existence, you must not go so far as to paralyze it. Men begin to desert the farms because they do not find the same income and the same opportunity for themselves and their children on the farm that they find elsewhere.

The opportunities for success may be cut off so much that men will leave the farms, and, as Sir Thomas Buckle says, when that time is reached, it matters not how gilded may be your domes, it matters not how magnificent may be the residences, it matters not how great the schools and the universities, the moment that point is reached when agriculture begins to wane and those people who produce wealth by cultivating the soil begin to leave that avenue of employment, that moment that nation has reached the point where it is a dying nation. Therefore I warn you, as the servants of that labor, the keepers of that freedom, that liberty which our fathers established on this continent—I warn you here now not to be so thoughtless, not to be so careless in the expenditure of wealth that you put a burden upon the people greater than they can bear, because if you do you are likely to reach that point where it will be followed with socialism and revolution and the destruction of the greatest Government of all time. The French Revolution was caused largely by the burdens of taxation. The revolution that destroyed the great Roman Empire was caused by the corn laws and by the burdens of taxation. Rome was filled up then with idle people from the various avenues of industry. But men in everyday life would say, "This is the City of Seven Hills; this is the eternal city." They thought that was true. Men to-day say that this is the eternal Government here in the United States.

It is the future that God keeps from us, not the past. We can only learn by studying the past, and mankind has learned but slowly, even from the past, and unless we are wiser than those people who went before us, then I fear that we, too, are going to learn but little from the experience of the past. We may be too rich and too powerful. I do not know. I hope we are not. It may be that we have reached the day when men will not work with their hands, when men are going to avoid the toil that makes a people rich. Why? Because they see that their toil is in vain. It is all taken from them by the Government and given to others; given to some official or State or Federal employee; or, what is just as bad, taken from them by others who are favored by the Government with some special privilege. The men who work on the farms can not enjoy these special privileges. Theirs is a life where God only can help them. He alone can give them health and strength and good seasons, and this alone can enable them to produce abundantly. The Government can not do this. But we hear the cry, "Back to the farm is the salvation of our Government."

Yes; but the cry will not be heard under present conditions. For, as I have said on this floor before, you may talk about the sweet-smelling up-turned sod, and the beauty of the dogwood blossoms, you may tell of how the fish used to bite, and picture the magnificent freckled-faced boy riding bareback on his mule to the field, and all that sort of thing, but I merely want to say that I tried that when I was a boy. The man who thinks that he will get a boy to stay on the farm or to return to the farm as long as conditions remain as they are now is mistaken. You must relieve him of the burdens you have placed upon him that are greater than he is willing to bear. No; he must have more joys and less burdens. He must see more hope for the future there than he can now see. No; I tell you that if Congress does its duty it must remove these burdens from those who toil.

Now, one other thing. I am in favor of maintaining the present mail service by airplane from New York to San Francisco. Some call this extravagance; if it is I plead guilty to it. I do not believe, however, it is extravagant, because, when I spend my money to put a few new acres of land in cultivation and build a new house on it, and get ready to raise more crops next year, I am doing a wise and economical thing. I hope I have gotten out of the stone-hatchet age. Some still live in it. You know that one of the greatest developments of modern times has been the development of this air service. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars developing the air service to kill people, developing the air service to drop bombs, developing the air service for war purposes. I do not know whether the experts tell the truth about it or not, but they say a development of a bombing plane or a fighting plane is not directly in line with the development of a plane for mail and commercial purposes. Now, that is the testimony of practically all of the men who fly when we have examined them in the past about it. There is no difference of opinion on this.

The Post Office Department sought a development of the air service for mails. Gen. Burleson first put it on. Nobody expected it to revolutionize the mail service in a minute, any more than the automobile took the place of the carriage in a day, or the telephone was established in a day, or steel ships to take the place of wooden ships in a day. But the present Postmaster General did this: He dropped all of the service except one route. His proposition was this: "We will establish a route from New York to San Francisco." Up to the present moment they have only been able to carry the mail in the daytime. That is to say, they will start with the mail at New York and carry it to the first stopping point before night, which, we will say, is Cincinnati or Chicago, and there deposit that mail, and a fast train takes it and carries it on during the night. The next morning whatever fast mail there may be is picked up and is carried on to the next point before night, and so on across the continent. In that way they have been able to reduce the time very much. But it has been rather disappointing in the time saved over the mail that travels both day and night. Now, the Postmaster General's program was that they would establish that one route and establish markers at night, so that the boys might fly from the time they left New York, and, except for taking the time in exchanging planes and perhaps crews, they will make one continuous flight. I do not mean with one plane, but they will have a continuous flight established clear across the continent, demonstrating whether it is feasible to carry freight and passengers by night, and thus maintain a continuous flight across the continent. Now, that is one of the longest flights that can be had, perhaps, in America, going east and west. Now, there is another reason for adopting it. If there is any important mail in New York from any of the European countries, destined for the Far East, it could be brought by fast ship to New York and carried by airplane across the continent. When you have demonstrated whether or not it is practicable then they can fix a charge for such mail that about pays expenses and thus ascertain of what value such service is. No man would pay 10 or 12 cents to carry a letter as a mere experiment.

I think the amount asked for by the Post Office Department is a reasonable amount for the purpose of demonstrating to the people of this country and of the world what can be done. I think it was a stone-hatchet policy to cut that item out. I would rather have cut items at other places than to cut that out.

A MEMEBER. Why did you not?

Mr. SISSON. Because the majority of the committee did it. I did not do it. They did perhaps what you are going to do, to vote for a penny-wise and pound-foolish proposition. I do not believe, gentlemen, that they were justified in cutting that out.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. It is true, is it not, that the item was subject to a point of order and that there was no question there would be a point of order raised? Is it not also true that the Senate will pass this item, and, if the bill finally passes, it will contain the item suggested?

Mr. SISSON. That is true. We hoped that nobody would raise the point of order. I would have brought the item in here, and if anybody wanted to make the point of order, he could do it. But at any rate, I am sorry the item went out of the bill. I do not think the House ought to pass the buck to the Senate. Every man ought to perform his own duties and do as he sees fit. I could have passed this buck if I had wanted to and not said anything about it. I would rather move along a little. It has been the Government that developed the telegraph service and demonstrated its usefulness, and we are going to have to do this now.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. LAZARO. Would it not have strengthened the item in the bill if it had been brought out and gone out on the point of order?

Mr. SISSON. I agree with the gentleman from Louisiana that it would have strengthened its position in the Senate.

Now, this item that was stricken out of the bill also strikes me with peculiar regret, because we spent so many millions of dollars trying to develop this Air Service into a proposition to destroy the human race, to kill human beings. Now, we are not willing to spend a cent to develop the Air Service so as to make it useful to mankind and make it a blessing in time of peace. Now, all the authorities that have testified about it say that the plane is suitable for fighting purposes, but what they call the bombing plane is not at all adapted to carrying the mail. You need a great deal of space in the machine that carries mail, and you need stabilization to a greater or less extent, and then, in addition to that, you have got to have a well mapped out course.

The markers have got to be such that they can be distinguished at a considerable distance, so that the pilot may not go astray, and the greatest of all the problems is not in the clear days but in the foggy and cloudy days. They are working to overcome that difficulty if they can, and I was more than willing to vote to recommend this small appropriation in proportion to the great service to be rendered. If we could solve that problem, I think the money would be well expended.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. If the Post Office Department does not do this, is there any other agency of the Government or any private agency that is going on with the development of aviation for peaceful commercial purposes?

Mr. SISSON. No. I want to thank the gentleman for that question. He is absolutely right about it. I do not believe that men are going to spend enough money at this experimental stage on the commercial side of this problem to determine whether it is going to be a dividend-paying proposition for them. Men do not put their money into propositions unless they feel they can make money out of them. I believe that the American people can bear this burden more easily than any one company could. I understand that what is in the mind of the Postmaster General is that he wants to make an effort on this one route and eliminate everything else out of the bill, because he believes that is the most reasonable flight that can be taken. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has used 42 minutes. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, knowing the members of the subcommittee who framed this bill, I have all confidence in their report, and I shall not undertake to criticize their work. But I wish to take advantage of the general rules of the House to make a few remarks in connection with another matter.

If we can rely upon newspaper reports, it is a part of the program for this session of Congress to take up what is known as bonus legislation, or readjustment legislation, for the soldiers and sailors of the late war. Now, gentlemen, I just want to make a few statements in order that they may go into the RECORD, hoping that the members of the Committee on Ways and Means may give my suggestion some consideration when the proper time comes.

When we entered the war, or prior to our entry into the war, the base pay of the enlisted man in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps was approximately $15 a month. When we got into the war, realizing that $15 a month for a soldier in the field would not procure him the little necessaries that he ought to have, Congress increased the amount to $30. That would give the individual soldier $30 a month with which to buy a few little things for himself when away from home. Later on we passed the draft law. I took quite an active part in that. One of the provisions of that law that I was very insistent upon was one providing that the President of the United States, through the various draft boards, might exempt from the military service those having dependents. But prior to the passage of the draft law thousands of men had entered the service voluntarily from April 6 and before we passed that law, leaving at home wives and little ones and in some cases dependent mothers.

Following that legislation, in October, 1917, we enacted a law which required a soldier having dependents to set aside by compulsion $15 of the $30 that we had allowed him under the law that we had passed increasing his pay. In other words, we took $15 away from the soldier and sent it back to his home to help take care of his wife and little ones or other dependents, and the 110,000,000 remaining citizens of this country matched that with another $15, and if the soldier happened to have a child, we added $5 more. In that way his dependents were to be cared for.

For one—and I think I speak the sentiment of the vast majority of the people of this Nation—I believe that when the Government takes a man and puts him on the battle field to fight our battles for us, it is the duty of this country to take care of his dependents, and I would propose that in whatever readjustment legislation we enact the first thing done should be to provide that this Government should return to those men the sums of money taken from them for the support of their dependents at home. That would be the first proposition to be considered, in my judgment.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKENZIE. If I have time, I will yield.

Mr. SLEMP. What amount of money would that involve?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I am unable to say; but it is a matter that could readily be ascertained through the War Department. But whether it be $1,000,000 or $50,000,000, in my judgment it is right and just, and this Government could well afford to do it. That is what I would call readjustment of compensation.

Another thing: When we provided $30 a month to the boys——

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I have only 10 minutes. If I have time I will yield to the gentleman.

We provided $30 a month for the enlisted man, thinking of him as a single man. We provided that he should have $30 a month to go out and fight our battles for us. We had scarcely passed the law, and he was scarcely entering the field when the purchasing power of a dollar depreciated 50 per cent, so that he was no better off then than if he had been a soldier who had enlisted prior to 1917. In other words, when we intended him to get $30 he practically got only $15.

Did the man in the shop or the man on the farm or the man in the store or any other workingman in this country suffer in the same manner? Not by any means. The workingman got his wages raised, voluntarily or by strike, to enormous heights.

The common laborer got $4 or $5 a day, and sometimes more. The farmer got enhanced pay for his products. The merchant marked up the price of his goods, and the only man in this country who suffered absolutely from that reduction was the soldier boy in the field; and I say that we could very properly and justly give to each one of them $15 a month additional to make them whole and in that way readjust that part of their pay.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. In that connection does not the gentleman think that in these post office and rural route appointments that are taking place the ex-service men who served in the war should be given preference in the appointments?

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman is not very well acquainted with me or he would not have asked that question. Certainly I am for the soldier boy when his qualifications fit him for the place, but I am not discussing that now.

I do want to call the attention of my good friend the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], who is on the Ways and Means Committee, to this matter when it comes up for consideration, and to urge upon him that they first adjust the pay of the boys, to put them all upon a level, giving them what we took away from them, so that the man with a wife and little ones at home who out of the $15 that he had left would take a sufficient amount to pay his insurance, so that he might leave a little something to them if he died on the battle field, shall be put on a level with the rich man's son, who had his $30 from the Government and money from home. Take care of that first, and then I am satisfied that this great, rich, patriotic Nation of ours will be willing to add a little something on top of that in the nature of what we call a bonus. And what is a bonus? It is giving to some one a little more than the contract called for. And in my judgment, if a bonus is ever given anywhere, it should be given to these men. We can not pay them here. That is nonsense, and the soldier boy who would think for a moment that he would surrender his discharge papers that he holds in his pocket for any amount of gold at this time, in my judgment would be making a great mistake, for that discharge is better than any policy that he could hold in any accident insurance company in the world. But after all I am glad to know that the Congress of the United States is going to take up this question and settle it once for all, and I am sure that the Committee on Ways and Means will make it liberal, but will in no sense undertake to pay the soldier in full for his sacrifices, for that would destroy the one thing that has ever been dear to the people of every land, and that is their love and admiration and respect for the men who fight their battles and make the sacrifices for them, for without the sacrifices they would not be entitled to that consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I make this statement simply to have it go into the RECORD, so that when this momentous question comes up for consideration Members will think of it in the light of an adjustment first, and then such bonus as they may see fit to give. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on January 5 I submitted some remarks in what might be called a general discussion of the entire estimates which were submitted to Congress for the fiscal year 1923. A typographical error was made in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date as to some of the figures submitted, but the facts are that those estimates for the fiscal year 1923 showed a total of $3,809,413,659.53 as the appropriations which would be required to meet the expenditures for the fiscal year 1923. As was stated the appropriations actually made for the present fiscal year 1922 amounted to $3,771,900,514.

Since those remarks were made the Bureau of the Budget, or rather the President, has submitted supplemental estimates to Congress for additional appropriations for the year 1923. The estimates as they appeared in the Book of Estimates carried an item of $50,495,735 for the Shipping Board. The supplemental estimates amend that particular estimate and make it $100,000,000, or an increase of $49,504,265, which if added to the sum of $3,809,413,659.53 makes a total of appropriations asked for by the President for the fiscal year 1923 of $3,858,917,924.53, which is an actual increase over the appropriations made for 1922 of $87,017,410.53.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. For a brief question.

Mr. SNYDER. Is it not possible that before the Committee on Appropriations gets through with all the estimates the amount may be reduced to less than the amount appropriated for the present fiscal year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was coming to that. As we all know, the President estimated that there would be a deficit in 1923 of $167,571,977, and he told Congress that that could possibly be met by the practice of economy.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In just a moment. This additional, supplemental estimate increases that estimated deficit of the President to $217,076,242—the President's own figures. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who has wide knowledge of revenue matters, says in his judgment it will be six or eight hundred millions, and this may be true by the time Congress gets through making deficiency appropriations and new commitments on the Treasury. Now, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] says, Congress must exercise economy in order to cut that deficit down, and the Appropriations Committee in its report on this bill, and the House in its action on the Treasury bill, reduced the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget; but I wish to say to my friend from New York [Mr. SNYDER] that we are not going to get very far in the practice of economy if the House continues to pass bills increasing salaries in one bureau of the Government to the extent of $447,740, as it did this morning.

Mr. SNYDER. I quite agree with the gentleman's statement.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I wished to call the attention of the House to these figures as supplementary of the statement I made on January 5. I wanted to further emphasize the criticism I made at that time, not for partisan purposes but simply with the hope that the Bureau of the Budget in the future will function as the advocates of that law and the people expect it to function. We are in a situation where the Bureau of the Budget has estimated for 1923 more than $87,017,410.53 increase over the actual appropriations for 1922, and it must rest with Congress, and in the last analysis with the House of Representatives, as it always has, to cut the estimates down in the interest of economy and in the interests of the people. I want to commend these figures to the prayerful consideration of my friends the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Illinois, who had the colloquy with the gentleman from Mississippi about the general reduction of expenditures.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. In the estimated increase brought about by the bill this morning of $447,000, did the gentleman take into consideration the increase of receipts from the increase of applications as an offset against it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The advocates and proponents of that bill certainly claimed every dollar they could by the increase made. The largest amount they claimed which would be put in the Treasury, and that was a mere estimate, was $409,000, and that bill was passed in the face of a deficit of over $217,000,000. My point is that Members of this Congress can not afford to continue to make new commitments and thereby increase the great burden now resting on the people. [Applause.] And yet the Republican majority continues to do so. And let me say, further, that there is this increase of estimates despite the fact that hundreds of millions of it are for supplies, such as coal, furniture, bookcases, stationery, printing, and the like, which everyone figures will be reduced 15 to 25 per cent in 1923 from prices paid early in 1922. If this is considered, there is no way to determine just in what sum the President proposed to increase the appropriations for 1923. The people were promised there would be a downward cut in appropriations. If the President should have his way, the result will be an enormous increase and our Government will have to borrow to meet its ordinary expenses in peace times—a condition which no one will defend.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have all enjoyed very much the discussion which has taken place on the bill, because we have been furnished another declaration by those in authority that we may soon expect radical economies in the public administration. Promises are valuable things when kept. We have been assured ever since the Republican platform of 1920 appeared that if the people of the United States would but put in power a Republican Congress, with a Republican Chief Executive, all the terrible ills let loose from Pandora's box would disappear and it should be forever closed, and that we might expect an era full of prosperity and happiness and that the Republican Party in Congress, like Tittlebat Titmouse in Parliament, would give to each citizen that which he most desired. Of course, these promises were understood by a great many experienced in politics, knowing the vanity and short life of promises by political parties, but there are, as we all know, a considerable element of the American people who are guileless and who take at their full value these solemn promises by those high in station and authority, and who are frequently influenced to the extent of casting their votes in the hope if not in the belief that these promises will yield a dividend in beneficial legislation.

Now, I do not want the committee to labor under the impression that I believe that legislation is a cure for all industrial or commercial, agricultural, or trade difficulties and failures. We must realize that we can not lift ourselves by our boot straps, and we all realize that artificial prosperity is not the kind of prosperity that is for the best interests of the whole people of the United States. But on the faith of these promises the country has been waiting for many months, hoping that at last some of these roseate pictures, so skillfully portrayed by the master managers of the Republican Party, might be realized in the flesh and blood and would not simply remain as the depiction of a campaign dream on the political canvas.

The country and the people are beginning to discuss and wonder why we have not realized some of the promised blessings, and the question has arisen in the public mind, "When are the Republican Congress and the Republican administration to fulfill these promises and relieve our ills?"

But, gentlemen, the country need wait but little longer. The country need hesitate but a little while, for we are given assurance by a newspaper in the city of Washington that out of this legislative wilderness, out of the foul morass into which the Republicans have become bogged, out of the legislative mire in which you are now floundering there is to be guidance to firmer ground; there is to be leadership and rescue. The Washington Star of January 6, 1922, carries this statement:

PRESIDENT ASSERTS PARTY LEADERSHIP.

President Harding has determined to assert in a positive manner his leadership of the Republican Party, according to recent developments and to high authorities at the White House.

Not only is he extremely anxious to have Congress, without unnecessary delay, pass the several more important administration measures now pending, but he disapproves of organized group opposition to the legislative program as agreed to by the President and leaders in both the House and Senate. He is holding almost daily and nightly conferences with party leaders regarding legislation, and with all of those attending these conferences he has made plain his intentions as to his assertion of leadership.

FARM "BLOC" LEADERS CALLED.

He yesterday sent for Senators KELLOGG, of Minnesota; CAPPER, of Kansas; and KENYON, of Iowa, leaders of the "farm bloc" in the Senate, and in no uncertain terms made known to them his disapproval of bloc-sponsored legislation providing farmer representation on the Federal Reserve Board, besides indicating to them that he proposes to use the full weight of his office to defeat opposition to the administration's legislative program.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, whatever may be said in derogation of the policy of forming what may be called blocs or groups, either to promote or to resist legislation, whatever may be said as to the merits or demerits of such a policy, the question does occur to an inquiring mind why the President of the United States when he begins his attack against such a system should single out first and above all the little group in another body who are supposed to represent the agricultural interests of the Nation. The trouble with the farmer now is not so much that Congress does not do something for him as it is that the Congress of the United States does not quit doing things to him—that the Government does not stop granting favors to special interests at his expense. I would like to have some one rise in his place who has the ear of the upper councils and point out to the Congress and the country when it was that the manufacturers' bloc, having for its purpose the extortion by legislation of tremendous profits from the agriculturalists and the consumers of the Nation, was ever called to the carpet and lectured and its actions denounced. When, let me ask, was it that that little group in New England, who went before the Committee on Ways and Means and asked a tariff tax on boots and shoes and leather, and yet at the same time demanded that hides be admitted free, was ever the subject of presidential wrath such as we are advised was exhibited against the farm bloc?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman read a statement from a newspaper stating that the President had made such a statement. The gentleman has no knowledge of the fact that the President ever did make such a statement, has he?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will state frankly to the gentleman that I have no knowledge of that fact. The gentleman well knows that I am not permitted, nor is anyone on this side of the Chamber permitted, to become privy to the doings in the White House. Right here in the council chambers of this House we are not permitted to learn the doings of the gentleman's steering committee that shapes and directs legislation, and the gentleman should not wonder why I do not know, particularly when his own party does not know on this floor what policies are to be advocated, in advance, until behind closed doors, with drawn shades, his steering committee has met and dictated a policy that the majority party must follow.

Mr. SNYDER. I merely thought the gentleman must have definite knowledge of this matter, because he made such a direct statement.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, I am sure the gentleman did not think that, because he clearly understood me to base my statement upon the newspaper article which I read. The Evening Star newspaper of this city is credited at least with being reasonably close to the circles whose conferences prompted the article. Let me ask the gentleman from New York, who is interested enough in the matter to inquire my authority, when the surtax bloc, which was interested in reducing the surtaxes on incomes above $70,000 and transferring the money thereby lost to the Treasury to the others of the 100,000,000 people of this country, was ever pilloried by the President of the United States? On the other hand, the President, in his message delivered here, made it clear that he looked with disfavor on that element in the Republican Party that had the courage to oppose the efforts of the surtax bloc which sought to reduce their own surtaxes.

Mr. SNYDER. It would be very difficult to answer the gentleman's question, because there never was any such bloc.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, no; the bloc is not in very good standing now, I grant you, because there were enough independent Republicans out of your 300 membership to make it impossible for the surtax bloc to accomplish its purpose. Those independents refused to cut the surtaxes down to 32 per cent. Of course, that bloc was scattered before the votes of your own party and those of the Democrats, and necessarily it disclaims any existence at this time.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I might call his attention to one thing about which there is no dispute at all, and that is that the President has just called, or is about to call, through the Secretary of Agriculture an agricultural conference, in an effort to solve in a legitimate and orderly and helpful way all of the problems which confront the farmer.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh yes; I expected the gentleman from New York or some other statesman who is very much interested in agriculture to ask that question.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, permit me to answer first the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], and I can not answer any more questions I fear unless I get five minutes more time. Oh, yes; you are going to call a conference, and you are going to talk about it. You are going to have some professional farmers who will make observations about the matter and your conference will dissolve and nothing substantial will transpire as a result of its deliberations, just as was the case of your unemployment conference. Wise gentlemen met here and talked and talked and talked and discussed the matter and went back to their homes, and unemployment continued its march just the same, gaining recruits as it marched.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am afraid I will not have the time.

Mr. SISSON. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional time.

Mr. SNYDER. I do not think the gentleman from Texas knew when he was addressing the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] that he is not only a statesman, but one of the largest real farmers in the State of New York.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am sure that is true, although I never realized it as fully as I do now that I have the gentleman's assurance of that fact.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, one can tell that by looking at the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. He is one of these farmers who do not farm.

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, yes he does farm.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, he farms some down here in Congress, it is true. His duties in Congress during the last 8 or 10 years have been such that if he wants to farm he could not have farmed. I am as much a farmer as the gentleman from New York is. I own a farm and help keep it up.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, I do not run a farm in that way.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I know the type of farmer the gentleman is. He is a farmer of farmers every two years, along about the first part of November. [Laughter.] But let me inquire, having disposed of the surtax bloc, which the President never called upon the legislative carpet—let me inquire when the shipping bloc, composed of the coastwise shipping interests and the transcontinental transportation companies, who are seeking a repeal of the toll legislation, was ever called to account and lectured or scolded about its asking special privileges at the hands of the Congress of the United States? When was it rebuked for advocating the repeal of Panama Canal tolls?

And I might inquire further, when was it that the railroad bloc, which, "with its cohorts, gleaming in purple and gold, swept down on the White House like a wolf on the fold," ever was the subject of presidential wrath?

When an effort was made here to take $500,000,000 out of the Treasury and loan it to the railway companies, instead of sending them out into the markets of the country, where other people go for their credit, was this bloc arraigned at the bar of the White House? Was there ever any command that it disperse? The Chief Executive came here to this Chamber, as I now recall it, and expressed to Congress his desire that legislation looking to the granting of a particular relief to a particular interest should be granted.

Mr. BARKLEY. The President was the leader and head of that bloc.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think the committee of the gentleman from Kentucky practically as a whole indorsed the action of the President.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not assume the responsibility for all the things the committee does.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will get to the gentleman's committee in a moment. When were the interests who were responsible for the high rates that are now making impossible a return to normalcy, when were the interests that were keeping those rates so high that agricultural and other commercial interests of this Nation can not survive——

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In a moment I will.

When was that legislative bloc visited with the displeasure of the administration?

Oh, but that is not all. When we come to speak of tariff legislation, which has for its very essence the taking of money from one citizen through legislation and giving it to a special interest and a special class, we find the Chief Executive coming before this Congress and asking it to grant to him executive power more transcendant——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. When was that bloc, which, somehow or somewhere, induced the President of the United States to come before this Congress and request of it powers more transcendent than ever resided in a Chief Executive in time of peace, when he asked the Congress of the United States—the House of Representatives, if you please—to grant to the President the power to make and fix rates, tariff duties, and promulgate them, and upon that promulgation that they should become the law of the land, ever placed under the ban? Under the Constitution of the United States the power to raise revenue resides in the House of Representatives, and resides nowhere else. And yet we have the Chief Executive, whose party went all over the country in 1920 denouncing President Wilson for the exercise of broad powers during the time of war, we have this Chief Executive, elected on such a plea, coming before the Congress in peace times and asking the House of Representaives to actually, in one respect, abdicate its functions and turn them over to the President of the United States and give him power to fix the rates or tariff duties that shall be charged at the customhouses, and upon his promulgation to let that proclamation have the force of law.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Before we get too far away from the railroad-rate question, I wish to ask these questions.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Do not ask too many.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Just two. You can answer them if you like. Were not the wages for railroad employees fixed by a railroad board appointed by President Wilson, and were not the railroad charges fixed by an Interstate Commerce Commission appointed by Woodrow Wilson, and are not those the rates we have to-day?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Of course, they were while Wilson was in office. But I want to tell you that the present railroad rates were fixed by the act of 1920, passed by a Republican Congress, and your platform of 1920 claims credit for it. You placed in that act a section which guaranteed to the railway companies the earning of a fixed percentage.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. And not one single dollar has ever been paid out of the Treasury or can ever be paid out of the Treasury under the guaranty to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman does not understand the situation. The rates come out of the pockets of the people in either event. I said a little while ago that the chief trouble with the farmer lies in the things Congress does "to" him instead of its failure to do things "for" him.

If Congress will refuse to build up tariff barriers that tax him for the benefit of the manufacturer and that force him to buy in a restricted market and yet force him to sell in an unrestricted foreign market, his prosperity will increase. If Congress, instead of cutting off foreign trade by preferential rates, would encourage foreign trade; Europe will be enabled to buy the farmers' products and the farmer can sell what now he can not sell. His chief trouble now is lack of a foreign market.

If the farmer can be protected from ruinous freight rates, his condition will improve. If special legislation to aid other interests at his expense could be kept off the books, he can prosper and succeed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SLEMP. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OGDEN].

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the preparation of the bill the committee was mindful of the necessity of adhering to the strict line of economy and of eliminating every item of expenditure not essential to a proper and efficient standard of efficiency in administering the Postal Service. We regarded it as much the duty of the departments of the Government to lend assistance in returning the country to a normal state as it is the duty of private industry, and in omitting items not really essential to the Postal Service I feel that a contribution has been made to the effort to reach normalcy. I wish to acknowledge the assistance that the committee received from the representatives of the department who appeared and presented the estimates and the spirit of cooperation exhibited by them in the work involved in the formation of the bill. As a whole, they exhibited an eagerness to limit the expenditures to the services indispensable to a well and efficiently conducted business, and the large reduction in the estimates accomplished by the committee was in no small way made possible by the assistance and cooperation on the part of these officials. In the outset we were confronted with a deficit of $157,517,688 for the fiscal year 1921 and an estimated deficit for the fiscal year 1922 of $81,000,000. This disparity between revenues and expenditures should prompt very careful consideration of estimates for appropriations and the making of substantial reductions where such may be done without any impairment to the service. It is illuminating to review the revenues and expenditures covering the last two years and the estimated revenues for the current and ensuing fiscal years together with the origin of some of the items of expenditure that go to make up the large deficit of 1921. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1920, the revenues were $437,150,212, an increase over the preceding year of $1,000,000, in round numbers, and the expenditures were $454,420,695, or an increase over the previous year of $91,000,000. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, the revenues were $463,491,274, or an increase over the previous year of $32,341,062. The expenditures were $621,008,962, or an increase over the previous year of $166,588,267. The estimated revenues for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, are $480,000,000, or an increase over the previous year of $15,000,000, in round numbers. The estimated expenditures are $561,800,000, or a decrease over the previous year of $59,208,000. For the fiscal year 1923 the comptroller of the department has recently estimated that the revenues will be $520,000,000, or an increase over the previous year of $40,000,000. This bill for the fiscal year 1923 carries $553,764,375, or a decrease in the estimated expenditures for the previous year of $8,035,625. This is a decrease in the amount requested in the budget of $26,935,691 and approximately $27,000,000 less than the appropriations of 1922.

Statement of revenues and expenditures, 1920 to 1923, showing increases and decreases.

	Revenues and expenditures.	Increase.	Decrease.
1920—Revenues	$437,150,212	$1,000,000

Deficiency	33,764,375
Budget for 1923	580,700,066
Bill carries	553,764,375

As will be noted there was a deficit in 1920 of $17,270,483 and in 1921 of $157,517,688, and that the estimated deficit for 1922 is $81,000,000 and for 1923 $33,764,000. The increase in expenditures for 1920 is explained by the advent of the two bonuses, which gave substantial advances to a large class of employees. The expenditures for the fiscal year 1921, in which year the deficit of over $157,000,000 appears, includes extraordinary payments authorized by Congress in deficiency appropriations for allowances to railroads following an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission retroactive from November 1, 1916, affecting the expenses of the preceding three fiscal years. These payments aggregated $76,000,000, in round numbers. Another factor which played a part in creating this large deficit was the reclassification act allowing increased compensation to postal employees. This item alone amounted to $41,855,000. The additional payments to railroads over allowances theretofore in force were more than $30,000,000. If we eliminate the $76,000,000, representing the retroactive allowances to the railroad companies, the deficit for the year under consideration will be reduced to about one-half, and when the increase in the compensation of the employees, due to the reclassification act, the passage of which I had the pleasure of supporting, and the increase in the railroad transportation rates, without any corresponding increase in the revenues, are taken into consideration the appearance of deficits not only in the fiscal years 1920 and 1921 but in the succeeding two years should not be an occasion for surprise. Under these circumstances it does not follow that waste and extravagance have been and will continue to be practiced in the administration of the service.

The cost of operating the service has advanced to a higher cost level, not as a matter of choice on the part of anyone or the lack of economical administration but as a result of the things to which I have alluded. Cognizant of the necessity of keeping the cost of the Government activities at the minimum the committee has endeavored to provide for the maintenance of a high standard of efficiency in the conduct of the services at the least possible expenditure.

The estimates for appropriations as they came from the Budget Committee totaled $580,700,066. The bill as reported by the Appropriations Committee carries $553,764,375, or a reduction in the estimates of the Budget Committee of $26,935,691. And I desire to say that this reduction was not made arbitrarily, but it was accomplished by a very careful and thorough analysis of the manifold items entering into the estimates and using the pruning knife wherever the facts seemed to justify. I wish to review some of the larger items carried in the bill and point out the policy pursued in reaching the amounts which we believed were sufficient to take care of the several activities. The largest single item is that of $100,000,000 for compensation to clerks and employees at first and second class post offices. The amount estimated for was $104,750,000. The reduction of $4,750,000 was accomplished by materially decreasing the number of clerks to be admitted to the regular service and reducing the overtime allowance. The estimate was for an appropriation based upon the employment of 3,000 additional clerks during the balance of the current fiscal year and for 2,500 clerks during the fiscal year 1923, or an increase of 5,500 clerks in a period of 18 months. The appropriation suggested in the bill takes care of an increase of about 2,500 clerks to be appointed during the current and next fiscal year. This allowance for regular clerks is reflected in the temporary and auxiliary item, as it will be noted that a reduction of $4,000,000 has been made.

There are approximately 54,000 clerks and supervisory employees, segregated as follows:

Clerks	43,677
Special clerks	6,114
Supervisory employees	4,209

The clerks are carried in grades ranging in salaries from $1,400 to $1,500 and are promoted to the next higher grade at the beginning of the first quarter following one year's satisfactory service. Therefore it is necessary to carry an item for this automatic promotion. The estimate for this was $1,300,000; however, a reduction of the number of new clerks is reflected in the gross sum appropriated. Furthermore, it is necessary for the department to make an overtime expenditure, but upon investigation it was found that this item had grown very rapidly during the past few years.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OGDEN. Yes.

Mr. SLEMP. Is it not a fact that the department is satisfied that it can conduct the business next year with this amount?

Mr. OGDEN. Yes. The reductions were quite agreeable to the department, and the department felt sure that the business could be conducted in the fiscal year on the appropriation made.

In 1917 it amounted to $815,375.
In 1918 it amounted to $1,719,282.
In 1919 it amounted to $3,090,000.
In 1920 it amounted to $4,003,927.
In 1921 it amounted to $2,213,261.
In 1922 it amounted to $1,200,000.

The expenditure for overtime for 1923 will be materially reduced and brought back to something like normal. The Budget Committee recommended an appropriation of $43,300,000 for the compensation to postmasters, but this bill carries $300,000 less, and it is believed that this amount will be adequate.

Postmasters of the first, second, and third class post offices receive their compensation based upon gross annual receipts for the calendar year. For 1923 their compensation will be fixed on the receipts of the calendar year 1921. A comparison of the revenues for the first six months of 1921 with the same period of 1920 shows an increase of sixty-nine one-hundredths of 1 per cent, and by a comparison of the revenues for the third quarter of the calendar year and of the 50 largest offices of the final quarter with the same period of the year 1920 shows the receipts to be about the same. Manifestly the expenditures for 1923 will not greatly exceed those of 1922, which the department estimates at $42,870,000; hence the amount carried gives a sufficient leeway to take care of any increase in the third-class offices as well as any that may occur in the other classes.

The number of letter carriers on June 30, 1921, was 38,532, and since then over 400 additional carriers have been appointed, making the present number about 39,000. The estimates of the department for an appropriation of $71,000,000 included the appointment of 800 additional carriers by the end of the current fiscal year and 1,400 in the fiscal year 1923, or an increase of 2,200.

The bill carries $1,000,000 less than the department asked for, or $70,000,000, which amount should be sufficient to meet all requirements. It will not permit the increase in the number of carriers requested, but considering the lack of appreciable improvement in the revenues and the consequent indication of a limited growth in the mails there seemed to be no real justification for a larger expenditure.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. OGDEN. Yes.

Mr. SLEMP. The gentleman is confident, is he not, that the expenditures for the next fiscal year will not exceed that amount?

Mr. OGDEN. Yes. They have reduced the expenditures for the next fiscal year, as indicated by the gentleman from Virginia.

It may be true that the postal receipts can not be relied upon entirely in estimating the demands upon this service, as the expansion and growth of the cities will require the department to expand its service; however, the bill gives sufficient leeway to take care of any conditions likely to arise.

The compensation to the railroads for the transportation of mails is one of the large items in the bill, amounting to $88,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. OGDEN. The Second Assistant Postmaster General voluntarily reduced it to $95,000,000.

The original estimate was $98,200,000, but Mr. Shaughnessy, Second Assistant Postmaster General, voluntarily reduced it to $95,000,000 when he appeared before the Budget Committee, and when he came before our committee he consented to a further reduction of $9,000,000. He is entitled to be commended for this action, and under his able and earnest administration I am sure the results of the operation of the service will fully justify the good judgment that he has displayed. The rates for transporting the mails are fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the only latitude of discretion given to the department is in regard to the amount of space deemed necessary for the transportation of the mails. Of course, the full utilization of the space ordered and upon which the charges are made belongs to good administration, and the evidence shows that these orders are conservatively given and that what would be vacant space is being used for the carriage of magazines, thus effecting a substantial saving by decreasing the so-called blue-tag service. Furthermore, so-called "deadhead space" is made use of in the return of empty mail bags, which if transported otherwise would run into a considerable sum. The expenditure for 1921 for this service was $91,853,000, but for 1922 the cost has been brought down, and on December 10 the annual rate was $82,000,000, and allowing for a normal increase in the business it is believed that the cost will not exceed the amount of the appropriation. The employees engaged in handling the Railway Mail Service receive a scale of pay somewhat higher than the post-office clerks and carriers and their hours of actual service are less, but these differentials exist by reason of the type of work they perform, it being more hazardous and exacting.

Railway postal clerks are divided into classes A and B and arranged in six grades, with a range of salary from $1,600 to $2,300. The present cost of the service, which comprises the compensation of about 20,600 clerks, of the personnel of over 300 in the division superintendent's office, and of 200 laborers, is the sum of $43,600,000, and Gen. Shaughnessy believes that the increasing efficiency in this service will enable him to operate on a like sum for 1923 and take care of the automatic promotions and the necessary overtime cost.

It is gratifying to note that the Post Office Department is administering the service not only on a high plane of efficiency, but with marked economy, with the result that it is now estimated that the expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, will be $23,000,000 less than the appropriation. This achievement, of course, has been made possible by the commendable cooperation that has come from the army of energetic and faithful employees, many of whom are intrusted with the performance of very arduous and difficult duties requiring capacity and integrity.

This bill is submitted with the hope and expectation that it will provide the department with adequate funds for the proper administration of the service. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. SISSON. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that this bill (H. R. 13) was ever permitted to reach the floor of this House. If a particle of good could be accomplished by its consideration and passage, there might be some excuse for it, but when all of us know that no benefit whatever will come from it, but harm instead, then I wonder why you bring it here and permit its consideration. Not a life will be saved if it is passed, not a conviction had that would not come through the orderly processes of our State courts. No one will be benefited or helped. Many crimes which it does not punish may follow its passage, so why its necessity?

Everyone deplores the taking of human life. No one can be glad when a homicide is committed, and lynching is but a form of homicide. We all realize that all kinds of homicides are too frequent in every State in this Union. But will they be any less frequent simply because the Federal Government legislates and makes a felony a crime that is already condemned and made a felony now by every State in the Union? The same men who sit on grand juries in State courts will sit on grand juries in the Federal courts; the same juries that try men in State courts will try men in the Federal courts. Certainly these same men will not find more indictments if this law is passed than now, nor convict more promptly and readily than now. This is not a mere surmise, but is justified by our present and past experiences.

Lynchings are gradually becoming less frequent; they are decreasing year by year. For the last 36 years there have been 115 lynchings per year—2⅛ to each State of the Union. The number for the year 1921 was 63, or less than 1¼ to each State, or a decrease of about 50 per cent. This, to me, is encouraging progress, so why disturb a situation that is improving so rapidly?

Of course, there have been obstacles in the way. These obstacles still exist. Two entirely different races live in the same territory. There is a want of homogeneity in the population; besides there has been the permanent fixing of the two races into distinct and separate peoples by "outside influences and external predominant forces," and these are serious obstacles; but in spite of them headway has been made and will still continue if the people of the several States are permitted to work out their own salvation.

I believe that the proper and requisite service for a wise and patriotic statesmanship where different races occupy the same territory and constitute one citizenship is to do everything possible to encourage them to live in peace and harmony; at all events nothing must be done to increase the natural results of race differences. To treat the one as helpless infants requiring Federal aid is a mistake, and to consider the other as enemies of the Nation and their native States is a crime. To teach the one to distrust and harbor bitterness toward the other will do no good, and to excite and intensify race prejudices for mere party advantage should stop, and unless stopped grave and serious possibilities will surely follow. The great body of good people of the country know that the Federal Government should let the States solve these purely local questions. They know that peace and confidence can not come from distrust and suspicion and that this Congress can not, by statute, change God's eternal laws.

IS THE LEGISLATION CONSTITUTIONAL?

All I have stated relates to the policy of this kind of legislation. There is still another question equally important and equally serious to us, and that relates to the constitutionality of the proposed legislation—whether we, as Representatives, can honorably vote for it, for as Abraham Lincoln said in his Cooper Union speech of February 27, 1860:

> No man who has sworn to support the Constitution can conscientiously vote for what he understands to be an unconstitutional measure, however expedient he may think it.

In order, however, to determine this, let me call your attention, first, to the provisions of the bill:

(1) By its first paragraph it defines a mob to mean an assemblage composed of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving another person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed crime.

(2) That if any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage, such State shall, by reason of such failure, neglect, or refusal, be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the laws of the State, and to the end that such protection as is guaranteed to the citizens of the United States by its Constitution may be secured it is provided:

(3) That any State or municipal officer charged with the duty, or who possesses the power or authority as such officer, to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage, or who has any such person in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to prevent such person from being so put to death, or any State or municipal officer charged with the duty of apprehending or prosecuting any person participating in such mob or riotous assemblage who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to perform his duty in apprehending or prosecuting to final judgment under the laws of such State all persons participating, except such, if any, as are or have been held to answer for such participation in any district court of the United States, as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years or by a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Any person who participates in a mob or riotous assemblage that takes from the custody or possession of any State or municipal officer any person held by such officer to answer for some actual or supposed public offense and puts such person to death as a punishment for such offense, or any person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage that obstructs or prevents any State or municipal officer in discharging his duty to apprehend, prosecute, protect, or punish any person suspected of or charged with any public offense and puts such person to death as a punishment for such offense shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned for life or for not less than five years.

(4) That any person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage by which a person is put to death shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned for life or for not less than five years.

(5) That any county in which a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall forfeit $10,000, to be recovered by action in the name of the United States against the county for the benefit of the family of the person put to death.

UNDERTAKES TO PUNISH THE ACTS OF INDIVIDUALS.

It will be seen that all of the bill, except the first part of section 3, addresses itself to the action of private individuals. The alleged criminal acts of private individuals are those sought to be punished. It prescribes a code of law for the punishment of certain crimes committed within the jurisdiction of the several States of the Union. This is a clear invasion of the reserve powers of the States and can not be justified in any power granted to Congress or to any officer or department of the National Government. It invades the jurisdiction of the State and authorizes a control over the authorities of the State by the Federal courts to an extent that would enable the Federal courts to destroy counties and the properties of the citizens therein, although such citizens and counties may be entirely innocent of any participation in the crime. Under the provisions of this bill, citizens of another county or another State could go into a county in the silent hours of the night and commit a crime, and by so doing impose liability upon the county for their acts. To do this is contrary to every principle of justice, for innocent and thrifty people should never suffer for the acts of the lawless, and they should not be made to pay for the acts of others.

APPLIES ALSO TO LABOR UNIONS.

While it is stated in the committee's report, and I assume, therefore, that it is true, that the legislation is intended to curb lynching, at the same time it has been intimated that it has for its real purpose the curbing of the activities of labor unions and the membership of these organizations and embarrass them and their members during strikes with indictments in Federal courts. If this is the hidden purpose actuating those responsible for the bill, they have more than succeeded for its provisions are certainly broad enough to envelop and encompass them. To illustrate: Suppose a strike should occur anywhere in the country, on a railroad or in a factory—a half dozen of the striking employees are congregated on a street corner or in a store or in a public place peaceably attending to their everyday duties, and some strikebreaker or hired detective should order them to leave or move on and upon refusing to do so should begin shooting at them, under all the laws of God and man, they and all of them would have the legal right to take the life of their assailant because they would be acting in necessary self-defense. But, under this bill, they are refused the right of self-defense. If any of them shoot back or assist each other or "act in concert for the purpose of depriving" their assailant "of his life" "as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense," then they render themselves liable to the penalties of this bill. This simple illustration shows the extent to which it can be carried. Its limits are as broad and far-reaching as some regard the provisions of the fourteenth amendment.

CAN THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PUNISH CRIMES COMMITTED BY PRIVATE INDIVIDUALS?

But it matters not the class of citizens its purpose is to reach. It undertakes to punish the citizens' action—persons acting in their individual capacity and not State action, and to do this is beyond the power of Congress. The bill is not planted upon a single grant of power to the National Government. I have studied the report of the committee and citations of authority and the quotations under which its constitutionality is justified, and I find that none of the cases cited support the proposition contended for by the committee. The principles upon which the constitutionality of it is predicated are claimed to rest upon the first paragraph of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution. It is as follows:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

It is argued, and I presume seriously, that when a half dozen or more citizens commit a homicide that then the deceased has been denied by the State the equal protection of the law. This contention is ridiculous and in the teeth of the language of the amendment itself, and at variance with all the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. As stated in Rose's Notes on the United States Reports, volume 12, 105:

Fourteenth amendment nullifies all State legislation, and State action impairing privileges of citizens or injuring them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denying equal protection of laws.

And again, on page 106:

Fourteenth amendment was designed to prohibit State invasion of equal civil rights, and to authorize Congress to adopt appropriate legislation for correcting effects of prohibited State laws, but not to authorize enactment of laws for equal protection of civil rights.

And so forth.

And on page 108:

Civil rights, guaranteed by fourteenth amendment, can not be impaired by wrongful acts of individuals, unsupported by State authority.

Every provision of this bill, except the first part of section 3—and I think this part does, too, but this will be discussed later—undertakes to punish individual and not State action and this can not be done. The States alone have this power. It is reserved to them and can not be taken away or assumed by the National Government.

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people. (Art. X, amendment U. S. Constitution.)

The scope of the fourteenth amendment and the power therein conferred were liberally considered in the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 3; 27 Law Ed., 835). On page 839 of the Twenty-seventh Law Edition, the court said:

The first section of the fourteenth amendment, which is the one relied on, after declaring who shall be citizens of the United States and of the several States, is prohibitory in character and prohibitory upon the States. It declares that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation, and State action of every kind, which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the laws. It not only does this, but in order that the national will thus declared may not be a mere brutum fulmen, the last section of the amendment invests Congress with power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. To enforce what? To enforce the prohibition. To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts, and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation; but to provide modes of relief against State legislation or State action of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights; but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws, and the action of State officers, executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment. Positive rights and privileges are undoubtedly secured by the fourteenth amendment, but they are secured by way of prohibition against State laws and State proceedings affecting those rights and privileges, and by power given to Congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect; and such legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed State laws or State proceedings and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect. A quite full discussion of this aspect of the amendment may be found in United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542; XXIII, 588); Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313; XXV, 667), and Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 339; XXV, 676).

And on page 840 the court said:

And so in the present case, until some State law has been passed or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation, can be called into activity, for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority. Of course, legislation may and should be provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises; but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against, and that is State laws or State action of some kind adverse to the rights of the citizens secured by the amendment. Such legislation can not properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty, and property, defining them and providing for their vindication. That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and to supersede them. It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property, which include all civil rights that men have, are, by the amendment, sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law, Congress may, therefore, provide due process of law for their vindication in every case, and that, because the denial by a State to any persons, of the equal protection of the laws, is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection. In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizens but corrective legislation—that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt or enforce, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from making or enforcing, or such acts and proceedings as the States may commit or take, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from committing or taking. It is not necessary for us to state, if we could, what legislation would be proper for Congress to adopt. It is sufficient for us to examine whether the law in question is of that character.

An inspection of the law shows that it makes no reference whatever to any supposed or apprehended violation of the fourteenth amendment on the part of the States. It is not predicated on any such view. It proceeds ex directo to declare that certain acts committed by the individuals shall be deemed offenses and shall be prosecuted and punished by proceedings in the courts of the United States. It does not profess to be corrective of any constitutional wrong committed by the States; it does not make its operation to depend upon any such wrong committed. It applies equally to cases arising in States which have the justest laws respecting the personal rights of citizens, and whose authorities are ever ready to enforce such laws, as to those which arise in States that may have violated the prohibition of the amendment. In other words, it steps into the domain of local jurisprudence and lays down rules for the conduct of individuals in society toward each other and imposes sanctions for the enforcement of those rules without referring in any manner to any supposed action of the State or its authorities.

If this legislation is appropriate for enforcing the prohibitions of the amendment it is difficult to see where it is to stop. Why may not Congress with equal show of authority enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of life, liberty, and property? If it is supposable that the States may deprive persons of life, liberty, and property without due process of law, and the amendment itself does suppose this, why should not Congress proceed at once to prescribe due process of law for the protection of everyone of these fundamental rights in every possible case, as well as to prescribe equal privileges in inns, public conveyances, and theaters? The truth is that the implication of a power to legislate in this manner is based upon the assumption that if the States are forbidden to legislate or act in a particular way on a particular subject, and power is conferred upon Congress to enforce the prohibition, this gives Congress power to legislate generally upon that subject, and not merely power to provide modes of redress against such State legislation or action. The assumption is certainly unsound. It is repugnant to the tenth amendment of the Constitution, which declares that powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

And on page 841 the court said:

In this connection it is proper to state that civil rights, such as are guaranteed by the Constitution against State aggression, can not be impaired by the wrongful acts of individuals, unsupported by State authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings. The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong or a crime of that individual; an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property, or his reputation; but if not sanctioned in some way by the State, or not done under State authority, his rights remain in full force and may presumably be vindicated by resort to the laws of the State for redress. An individual can not deprive a man of his right to vote, to hold property, to buy and sell, to sue in the courts, or to be a witness or a juror; he may, by force or fraud, interfere with the enjoyment of the right in a particular case; he may commit an assault against the person, or commit murder, or use ruffian violence at the polls, or slander the good name of a fellow citizen; but, unless protected in these wrongful acts by some shield of State law or State authority, he can not destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction of punishment and amenable, therefore, to the laws of the State where the wrongful acts are committed. Hence, in all those cases where the Constitution seeks to protect the rights of the citizens against discriminative and unjust laws of the State by prohibiting such laws, it is not individual offenses but abrogation and denial of rights which it denounces, and for which it clothes the Congress with power to provide a remedy. This abrogation and denial of rights, for which the States alone were or could be responsible, was the great seminal and fundamental wrong which was intended to be remedied. And the remedy to be provided must necessarily be predicated upon that wrong. It must assume that in the cases provided for the evil or wrong actually committed rests upon some State law or State authority for its excuse and perpetration.

It will be noted that the proposed bill does not undertake to counteract or redress the operation of prohibitive State laws or proceedings of such officers acting under authority of State statutes, ordinances, regulations, proceedings, or customs. It defines a mob or riotous assemblage and makes everyone connected with it guilty of a crime, even innocent citizens of the county, together with officers of the county and State, and by so doing it invades the entire field of State action. It supersedes and displaces State legislation on the same subject or allows it permissive force. It ignores such legislation and assumes that the matter is one that belongs to the domain of national regulation. Whether more effective protection of the rights of citizens would come by clothing Congress with the power to enact this law, as is claimed by the report of the majority members of the committee, is beside the question, the only one being whether such plenary power has been conferred upon Congress by the fourteenth amendment, and it has not. In the case of United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 29; 27 Law Ed., 290) the court was asked to pass upon the constitutionality of section 5519 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making it a criminal offense for two or more persons in a State or Territory to deprive any person of the equal protection of the laws of the State, and the court declared the law unconstitutional. On pages 293 and 294 of the Twenty-seventh Law Edition the court said:

It is, however, strenuously insisted that the legislation under consideration finds its warrant in the first and fifth sections of the fourteenth amendment. The first section declares "All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The fifth section declares: "The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this amendment."

It is perfectly clear from the language of the first section that its purpose also was to place a restraint upon the action of the States. In the Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall., 36; 83 U. S., XXI, 394), it was held by the majority of the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Miller, that the object of the second clause of the first section of the fourteenth amendment was to protect from the hostile legislation of the States the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and this was conceded by Mr. Justice Field, who expressed the views of the dissenting justices in that case. In the same case the court, referring to the fourteenth amendment, said that, "If the States do not conform their laws to its requirements, then by the fifth section of the article of amendment Congress was authorized to enforce it by suitable legislation."

The purpose and effect of the two sections of the fourteenth amendment above quoted were clearly defined by Mr. Justice Bradley in the case of United States v. Cruikshank (1 Woods, 316), as follows: "It is a guaranty of protection against the acts of the State government itself. It is a guaranty against the exertion of arbitrary and tyrannical power on the part of the Government and legislature of the State; not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses; and the power of Congress, whether express or implied, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppression of crime within the States. The enforcement of the guaranty does not require nor authorize Congress to perform 'the duty that the guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the State to perform and which it requires the State to perform.'"

When the case of United States v. Cruikshank came to this court, the same view was taken here. The Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said: "The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or from denying to any person the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not add anything to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guaranty against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society. The duty of protecting all its citizens in the enjoyment of an equality of rights was originally assumed by the States, and it remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees and no more. The power of the National Government is limited to this guaranty." (92 U. S., 542; XXIII, 588.)

So in Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313; XXV, 667) it was declared by this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Strong, that "These provisions of the fourteenth amendment have reference to State action exclusively and not to any action of private individuals."

These authorities show conclusively that the legislation under consideration finds no warrant for its enactment in the fourteenth amendment.

The language of the amendment does not leave this subject in doubt. When the State has been guilty of no violation of its provisions; when it has not made or enforced any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; when no one of its departments has deprived any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor denied to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; when, on the contrary, the laws of the State, as enacted by its legislative and construed by its judicial and administered by its executive departments, recognize and protect the rights of all persons, the amendment imposes no duty and confers no power upon Congress.

And on page 295 of the same report (27 Law Ed.) the court said:

There is another view which strengthens this conclusion. If Congress has constitutional authority under the thirteenth amendment to punish a conspiracy between two persons to do an unlawful act, it can punish the act itself, whether done by one or more persons.

A private person can not make constitutions or laws, nor can he with authority construe them, nor can he administer or execute them. The only way, therefore, in which one private person can deprive another of the equal protection of the laws is by the commission of some offense against the laws which protect the rights of persons, as by theft, burglary, arson, libel, assault, or murder. If, therefore, we hold that section 5519 is warranted by the thirteenth amendment, we should by virtue of that amendment accord to Congress the power to punish every crime by which the right of any person to life, property, or reputation is involved. Thus under a provision of the Constitution which simply abolished slavery and involuntary servitude we should, with few exceptions, invest Congress with power over the whole catalogue of crimes. A construction of the amendment which leads to such a result is clearly unsound.

There is only one other clause in the Constitution of the United States which can in any degree be supposed to sustain the section under consideration, namely, the second section of Article IV, which declares that—

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States."

But this section, like the fourteenth amendment, is directed against State action. Its object is to place the citizens of each State upon the same footing with citizens of other States, and inhibit discriminative legislation against them by other States. (Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall., 168; 75 U. S., XIX, 357.)

The court in Gardner v. Michigan (199 U. S., 153; 50 Law Ed., 213) reaffirmed the same views expressed in the cases heretofore mentioned. And the court in Logan v. United States (144 U. S., 263; 36 Law Ed., 429) said, on page 437 of the Law Edition, the following:

It was held that a conspiracy of individuals to injure, oppress, and intimidate citizens of the United States with intent to deprive them of life and liberty without due process of law did not come within the statute, nor under the power of Congress, because the rights of life and liberty were not granted by the Constitution, but were natural and inalienable rights of man; and that the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, declaring that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, added nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another, but simply furnished an additional guaranty against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society. It was of these fundamental rights of life and liberty, not created by or dependent on the Constitution, that the court said: "Sovereignty, for this purpose, rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself." (92 U. S., 553, 554; 23: 591, 592.)

It was held that the provision of the fourteenth amendment forbidding any State to deny any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws gave no greater power to Congress. (92 U. S., 555; 23: 592.)

It was held, in accordance with United States v. Reese, above cited, that courts for conspiracy to prevent and hinder citizens of the African race in the free exercise and enjoyment of the right to vote at State elections, or to injure and oppress them for having voted at such elections, not alleging that this was on account of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude, could not be maintained, the court saying:

"The right to vote in the States comes from the States, but the right of exemption from prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, but the last has been." (92 U. S., 556, 23, 592.)

I also call attention to United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542; 23 Law Ed., 588); Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313; 25 Law Ed., 667); Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 539; 25 Law Ed., 675); Butchers' Union v. Crescent City (111 U. S.; 28 Law Ed., 585); Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall., 36; 21 Law Ed., 394).

Each of these cases shows that Congress has no general legislative power under the fourteenth amendment making the acts of individuals crimes by virtue of that amendment, but that the only power in the United States Government to pass laws results from powers delegated to the National Government by the Constitution. There is one clause of the Constitution that expressly gives Congress power to pass criminal statutes; that is clause 10, section 8, Article I, which reads:

10. To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high-ways, and offenses against the laws of nations.

The enumeration of this power under familiar rules of construction would eliminate all power in other cases to pass general criminal laws not having a relation to and an expressed grant of the power to the Federal Government. It is possible that under this clause Congress could pass a law punishing the lynching of citizens of other countries, especially when it had entered into a treaty to protect such citizens, but to go further than this is beyond its power.

I have considered every case passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States that deals directly or indirectly with this subject, and I fail to find a single one which bears out the idea that Congress has the power to punish individuals for the commission of crimes, the States alone being in possession of this power.

OTHER AUTHORITIES ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

James G. Blaine, in his Twenty Years of Congress, gives expression to this same constitutional truth in discussing the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. He says, on page 419, that—

Both of those amendments operate as inhibitions upon the power of the State and do not have reference to those irregular acts of the people which find no authorization in the public statutes. The defect in both amendments, in so far as their main object of securing rights to the colored man is involved, lies in the fact that they don't operate directly upon the people, and therefore Congress is not endowed with the pertinent and applicable power to give redress.

Again he says, in speaking of violence, such as mobs, as follows:

Those outrages are the deeds of individual citizens or of associated masses, acting without authority of law and in defiance of law.

And, of course, says that Congress has no power to legislate, as this field is solely within the reserve power of the States.

Mr. Bryce, in his American Commonwealth, volume 1, pages 338 and 339, makes substantially the same statements as those made by Mr. Blaine. He says:

What then, the European reader may ask, is the National Government without the power and the duty of correcting the social and political evils which it may find to exist in a particular State and which a vast majority of the Nation may condemn? Suppose widespread brigandage to exist in one of the States, endangering life and property. Suppose contracts to be habitually broken and no redress to be obtainable in the State courts. Suppose the police to be in league with the assassins. Suppose the most mischievous laws to be enacted, laws, for instance, which recognize polygamy, leave homicide unpunished, drive away capital by imposing upon it an intolerable load of taxation. Is the Nation obliged to stand by with folded arms while it sees a meritorious minority oppressed, the prosperity of the State ruined, a pernicious example set to other States? Is it to be debarred from using its supreme authority to rectify these mischiefs?

The answer is yes. Unless the legislation or administration of such a State transgresses some provision of the Federal Constitution—such as that forbidding ex post facto laws, or laws impairing the obligation of a contract—the National Government not only ought not to interfere but can not interfere. The State must go its own way, with whatever injury to private rights and common interests its folly or perversity may cause.

All of the authorities cited merely show that which will be observed by a reading of the first paragraph of the fourteenth amendment. It is clear in its provisions, otherwise courts in considering it immediately after the Civil War, when the temper of people generally was aroused, would have given it very much more liberal and far-reaching interpretation. As a matter of fact, the Congress knew its true meaning at the time it was adopted. They knew it applied only to State action, for they voted down an amendment which would give the Federal Government the right to do exactly what is sought by this bill.

BUT IS THE FIRST PART OF SECTION 3 OF THE BILL CONSTITUTIONAL?

Under the authority of these decisions and quotations all that part of the bill is unconstitutional except the first part of paragraph 3. But what about this part of it? This is the part that undertakes to create an offense upon a State or county officer having a prisoner in his custody and who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to prevent the prisoner from being taken by a mob and put to death. But it is claimed that under the case of Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 339) that Congress has the right to pass this character of legislation. A reading of the whole case will convince anyone that this is not true. This case holds exactly the contrary. Page 345, in speaking of the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments, the court said:

They were intended to be what they really are, limitations of the power of the States.

And on page 346 it is stated:

The provisions of the fourteenth amendment are directed to the States, and they are to a degree restrictions of State power.

And again on pages 346 and 347 it was stated:

We have said the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment are addressed to the States. They are:

"No State shall make or enforce a law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The judge in this case in excluding and failing to select juries solely because they were Negroes was acting for the State and within the powers conferred upon him by the State, and therefore did act as a State officer in his discretion as such officer. It was the only expression that the State could make through its officer. On the other hand, if the State law prohibited the doing of this and he could be punished therefor under State laws if he was a lawbreaker, then it was not the State's act.

The first part of the fourteenth amendment addresses itself to State action, and the act of an officer acting as a citizen contrary to a State statute can not be the act of the State. If the officer was acting in pursuance of a State statute that was unconstitutional, as was the case in Ex parte Young, or if he were acting as an officer with discretion and in an unconstitutional way, then the State might be considered acting; but when the officer acts contrary to and in violation of the State law—in other words, as a private individual—his act ceases to be that of a State officer and he becomes simply a State lawbreaker, and is punishable under the laws of the State whose laws have been broken as any other criminal. If this were not so, any State officer at any time could do any foolish or willful act entirely outside of his authority and in violation of the law too, and by so doing give Congress the power to act on the subject, and pursuing this to a finality the States would be destroyed and the dual form of our Government ended. To hold any other way will destroy the Constitution; in other words, make the Constitution destroy itself. All of the States have statutes covering this entire subject. Murders are forbidden, conspiracies are condemned and made violations of the law, and so forth. Some States have laws exactly in the form of this one. All of them do everything within their power as States to prevent lynchings.

As further evidence that it was State action in its true sense and not the mere violation of the law by an officer acting in his individual capacity that was condemned in the Virginia case just cited, the State itself recognized that it was a party to the litigation by filing a petition in its own name, praying for a habeas corpus and the discharge of Coles, the judge. In addition to this, on page 348, the court says:

Coles, when he refused to permit Negroes to act as jurors, was "claiming to act for the State."

It is further contended by some that under the provisions of the Home Telephone Co. v. Los Angeles (227 U. S., 278) Congress may legislate as to a public officer and punish him whenever a murder is committed or a person is taken from him by force and murdered. I think I have already shown that no such power is vested in the Congress; but since this case, too, has been referred to and cited in support of a contrary contention, it is well to discuss it. In Los Angeles an ordinance was passed by the proper city authorities fixing telephone rates for a given period. This right was one possessed by these officers, and acting on it they passed the ordinance. The telephone company claimed the rates fixed were so low as to be confiscatory and hence were repugnant to the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment, and hence a bill was filed praying an injunction, and so forth. The contention of the city was that because the State of California had a provision in its constitution exactly in the language of the due-process clause of the fourteenth amendment, that the State had acted and that any act in violation of this provision of the constitution by the city could not be attacked in the United States courts until the supreme court of the State upheld the act. In other words, that the Federal courts had to wait until all the State courts had acted and could not proceed until final action had been taken by them, although the acts of the officers might also be in violation of the Federal Constitution. The court, however, held that one whose rights, protected by a provision of the Federal Constitution which is identical with a provision of a State constitution, are invaded by State officers claiming to act under a State statute is not debarred from seeking relief in the Federal court under the Federal Constitution until after the State court has declared that the acts were authorized by the statute. It will be seen, then, that the most this case holds is:

> It presupposes the possibilities of an abuse by a State officer or representative of the powers possessed and deals with such a contingency. (P. 287.)

I also direct your attention to this quotation from page 288:

> Under these circumstances it may not be doubted that where a State officer, under an assertion of power from the State, is doing an act which could only be done upon the predicate that there was such power, the inquiry as to the repugnancy of the act to the fourteenth amendment can not be avoided by insisting that there is a want of power. That is to say, a State officer can not on the one hand, as a means of doing a wrong forbidden by the amendment, proceed upon the assumption of the possession of State power and at the same time, for the purpose of avoiding the application of the amendment, deny the power and thus accomplish the wrong. To repeat, for the purpose of enforcing the rights guaranteed by the amendment, when it is alleged that a State officer, in virtue of State power, is doing an act which, if permitted to be done prima facie, would violate the amendment, the subject must be tested by assuming that the officer possessed power if the act be one which there would not be opportunity to perform but for the possession of some State authority.

Consider carefully, too, the significance of the language in the following quotation from page 290:

> Determining whether the enforcement of the State officer of a nondiscriminating statute in discriminatory manner was within the amendment.

These quotations, as well as a careful reading of the opinion, will convince anyone that an officer must be acting as an officer and not in his capacity as an individual in order to be within the purview of the Constitution. There is not a single decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which holds to the contrary. An officer must be doing something that he regards as one of his duties, as was so in this case, otherwise he is not acting as an officer and his act is not the act of the State. When an officer has his shoes shined, he is not acting as a State officer. When he goes bird hunting, he is not acting as a State officer. After his day's work is over and he goes to a moving-picture show or a theater, he is not then acting as a State officer. He is acting as an individual. So, when an officer violates the law against gambling, when he commits a homicide, when he commits any criminal act, he is acting as a private individual and not in his official capacity. In the instant case the authorities were acting as a rate-fixing board, they were pursuing their duties as officers, they were "enforcing the provisions of a nondiscriminatory statute," but were enforcing it in a discriminatory manner, and to do this was a violation of the fourteenth amendment. The same thing would apply to any other officer who has a discretion to perform and who exercises this discretion in such manner as to violate the provisions of the fourteenth amendment. But this does not mean and can not mean that an officer who commits a crime commits it as an officer. It is not in line with his duties. It is an act of violence and contrary to the laws of the State and condemned by the laws of the State, and can be reached by the laws of the State and only by them.

A sheriff who turns over a State prisoner to a mob can not be punished by a Federal court. The Federal Government can not act in such cases. The officer had no discretion in the matter—his duty is well defined. The law of the State requires him to keep his prisoners safe from harm. He must act in one way and only one, and that is in conformity with the law which requires him to safely keep those in his custody. If he fails in this, or if he refuses to do this, he is simply a lawbreaker and punishable the same as a private citizen who is guilty of another kind of a crime. He is acting purely as a private individual. This is exactly what was held in Barney v. State of New York (193 U. S., 430), the court holding that where it appeared on the face of plaintiff's own statement of his case that the act complained of was not only unauthorized but was forbidden by the State legislation in question, the circuit court rightly declined to proceed further and dismissed the suit. This case dealt with the construction of a tunnel which was being built contrary to the plans and specifications adopted by the municipal authorities, and in deciding it the court said that the—> defendants were proceeding not only in violation of provisions of the State law, but in opposition to plain prohibitions. (P. 441.)

The court also said, on page 437:

> Controversies over violations of the laws of New York are controversies to be dealt with by the courts of the State. Complainant's grievance was that the law of the State had been broken and not a grievance inflicted by action of the legislative or executive or judiciary departments of the State; and the principle is that it is for the State courts to remedy the acts of State officers done without the authority of or contrary to State law. (Missouri v. Dockery, 191 U. S., 165; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S., 3; Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S., 313.)

In the case of United States against Thompson et al., decided January 3, 1922, the court held that the United States Government was not liable for the torts of an agent. By the same reasoning neither can the acts of a lawbreaker be regarded as the acts of a State. The State defines certain acts to be crimes. It condemns them. These acts are not the acts of sovereignty.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Suppose he merely neglects to take the precaution that is necessary to protect the prisoner in his custody, then what does the gentleman have to say with respect to liability?

Mr. COLLINS. I was going to get to that in a little while, but I do not mind answering it now. There is no denial of equal protection of the law, because he has given to the man in his custody the same protection that every other prisoner has had. Everyone has the same protection and all the Constitution guarantees is the same sort of protection for every man in his custody.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Suppose it is shown that the man charged with murder or rape happens to be a white man who, six months before, had been arrested by him, was in his custody, and while there there were a good many threats made, yet his attitude was such that no assault was made on the prisoner in his charge.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman assumes that he did nothing but his duty. Of course, he has violated no statute.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But in the one case he did his duty and in the other he failed to protect the prisoner in his charge.

Mr. COLLINS. If he did his duty, the State has not denied the equal protection of the law. If he failed to do his duty, he can be punished by State authorities.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If I have not succeeded in making myself clear, my question is this: In the one instance his action resulted in protecting the prisoner in his charge and in the other instance his action failed to protect the prisoner, or his inaction failed to protect the prisoner.

Mr. COLLINS. Of course, we all know that States, through public officers, can not keep people from committing acts of violence. All in the world that the last clause of the first section of the fourteenth amendment does is to prevent a State from denying to any person the equal protection of its laws. In other words, it condemns State action that does this and not individual action, and the law is that when an officer does something in violation of a State law then his action is that of an individual and not that of an officer. If the gentleman from Kansas went down town and got drunk, he would not be acting as a Congressman of the United States but as an individual, as a citizen. Anybody who is a lawyer and familiar with the decisions knows this.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Constitution guarantees the equal protection of the law.

Mr. COLLINS. It does not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It guarantees that no State shall deny equal protection of the law.

Mr. COLLINS. That is right; that is the way it is.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In the question I put in the one instance the officer gave the protection of the law to the prisoner in his charge, and in the other case he failed to give that protection.

Mr. COLLINS. The State did not violate any provision of the Constitution in either instance. The same officer gave to every prisoner within his jurisdiction the same protection, the identical protection, and equal protection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In one case he protected the prisoner from the mob.

Mr. COLLINS. In the one case murder was committed and in the other murder was not committed, but the State did not commit the murder. Some lawbreaker did it, and lawbreakers are not agents for the State. States operate through legislatures, through the courts and other public officers, and only through them. States do not operate through reckless or lawless individuals, and when an officer violates the law he is not acting for the State, but as an individual. If the gentleman will read the cases he will see that that is correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have evidently failed to make my point clear to the gentleman.

Mr. COLLINS. No; the gentleman has not. I understand it thoroughly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then the gentleman has not answered my question. The officer in both cases represents the State.

Mr. COLLINS. Not when he does an unlawful act.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He is in charge of the prisoner in both cases.

Mr. COLLINS. Sure, and the State law requires him to protect the prisoner.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But in the one instance he protects the prisoner and in the other he does not.

Mr. COLLINS. Then he has violated the State law and the State can punish him, but the Federal Government can not because it is a State matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The fourteenth amendment guarantees equal protection of the law.

Mr. COLLINS. To whom?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. To all people.

Mr. COLLINS. No; it does not. The gentleman ought to be ashamed to say that. The fourteenth amendment addresses itself to State action and not to individual action.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think after the semicolon it addresses itself to the sheriff.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman can not cite a single case to uphold him in that. If the gentleman will get Rose's Notes, he will see that after the word nor "any State" is added. If the gentleman will examine any of the cases, he will be driven from such a conclusion. Even a reading of the amendment will show him this. It is pure ignorance for the gentleman to talk otherwise.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. At least, I am not prejudiced in the matter.

Mr. COLLINS. And neither am I. If I thought the bill would do a single particle of good, I would vote for it, but I know better than that.

Aside from all this, there has been no denial to any person the equal protection of the laws provided for in the fourteenth amendment, because the States have not, in fact, accorded prisoners that have been lynched other and different protection than that accorded other prisoners. All that is required by the Constitution is the same kind of protection or equal protection, and this has been given.

The report of the Tuskegee University, as quoted by the author of the bill, shows that the States do everything within their power to prevent lynchings. It says:

> According to the records compiled at Tuskegee Institute by the department of records and research, Monroe N. Work, in charge, there were 72 instances in which officers of the law prevented lynchings. Of these, 8 were in Northern States and 64 in Southern States. In 1920 there were 56 such instances, 46 in Southern States and 10 in Northern States. In 66 of the cases, the prisoners were removed, or the guards were augumented, or other precautions taken. In 6 instances armed force was used to repel the would-be lynchers. Concerning the cases of lynching, there were 19 instances in which prisoners were taken from the jail and 16 instances in which, before reaching the jail, they were taken from the officers of the law.

This same report shows that less than one and one-third lynchings per year average per State were committed for the year 1921. Is this small average sufficient to show a State policy in favor of lynchings? Is this small average sufficient for us to charge that the States and State officers are denying to prisoners the equal protection of the laws? If this is so, then any homicide that is committed, any theft, burglary, or any crime of any character can also equally be deemed a denial of the equal protection of its laws to its citizens and a sufficient one to warrant the Federal Government to legislate on the subject. Followed to its ultimate conclusion, Congress could pass laws covering every offense or crime committed within the borders of sovereign States, all State governments must be conducted without error, no crime must be committed within their borders, all must be perfect, otherwise Congress can take over the entire subject and legislate accordingly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Could a State be liable for inaction?

Mr. COLLINS. Of course not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It could only be held liable then under the fourteenth amendment, taking both clauses——

Mr. COLLINS. Oh, there are five of them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I mean both clauses that refer to equal protection of law.

Mr. COLLINS. The first and the last sections are the ones which the gentleman is interested in.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The only ground upon which it could become liable would be upon some affirmative action upon the part of the State. Is that the contention of the gentleman?

Mr. COLLINS. Of course, if a State did not violate a provision of the amendment there can be no ground for Federal action.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And that a failure to act in any particular would not make them liable?

Mr. COLLINS. Of course not.

NOT PERMISSIBLE UNDER DUE PROCESS CLAUSE EITHER.

It has not been suggested by anyone, but it may be yet, that the first part of section 3 of the bill may be enacted under that clause of the fourteenth amendment, which provides:

> Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

This clause, however, would have no more application than the other because it, too, addresses itself to State action. But let us consider the view most favorable to the constitutionality of this part of the bill—the one that assumes that this can be done—that a State officer by failure to prevent a lynching and under the conditions prescribed in the bill represents the State and that his action is State action. This action would not then amount to a deprivation of the person lynched of due process of law granted by the fourteenth amendment. The bill does not predicate liability of the officer upon participation by him in the lynching or by his aid, assistance, or connivance. It predicates liability upon his failure, neglect, or refusal to "make all reasonable efforts to prevent a lynching." He committed no act, hence there was no State action. If any person was deprived of his life without due process of law, it was done by individuals who composed the mob. The officer did not do it, so under no possible circumstances could Congress reach the subject under the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. If a contrary view should be taken, then Congress would be warranted in passing laws covering any situation where State officers failed to give protection to life, liberty, or property as against the lawless acts of individuals. If an assault is committed by one individual upon another individual, then this person has not had the equal protection of the laws because of the failure of State officers to prevent it and therefore Congress must legislate upon the subject. If a house is broken into in the night, officers should have prevented this, the person injured has not been protected in his rights, and Congress must legislate on this subject, too. Under this view, Congress can impose penalties upon State officers whenever any crime has been committed within the borders of a State or because of any wrong done to an individual or corporation. In other words, the entire field of State action can be entered.

The due process clause of the fourteenth amendment is directed against some deprivation of due process of law by the State or some of its officers or agents; that is to say, some action by the State or some of its agencies which, of itself, results in the denial of due process of law to some person. If the wrong suffered is the direct and immediate result of lawless action by individuals there can not, in any real sense, be a deprivation of due process of law by the State as contemplated by the fourteenth amendment. Congress has no power under the fourteenth amendment to destroy our form of government. An interpretation of a provision of the Constitution can not be sanctioned when this interpretation will destroy other sections of the Constitution. Neither will an interpretation of a provision of the Constitution be sanctioned that will destroy our dual form of government. Constitutional provisions must be construed so as to harmonize them with other provisions of the Constitution. This is settled law. Evans against Gore, recently decided.

STATES ALONE POSSESS POLICE POWERS.

But it is stated that under its police powers the Federal Government can legislate to punish crimes in the several States. Of course nobody up to now has ever heard of the police powers of the Federal Government. They are not in the Constitution. And I can not believe that anyone will seriously contend that there are any such powers. Under article 10 of the amendments to the Federal Constitution, it has been expressly held that the police powers are not granted to the Federal Government, but such powers are reserved to the States.

In Kelier v. United States (213 U. S., 138; 53 Law Ed., 737) the court was called on to pass on the constitutionality of a Federal statute seeking to declare certain acts an offense when committed wholly within the jurisdiction of the State, but it was very expressly held that the Federal Constitution does not grant any of the police powers to Congress, but reserves such powers to the State. The court said, on page 741 of Fifty-third Law Edition:

That there is a moral consideration in the special facts of this case, that the act charged is within the scope of the police power is immaterial, for, as stated, there is in the Constitution no grant to Congress of the police power.

See also New York v. Mill (9 Law Ed., 648), United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542; 23 Law Ed., 588), Butchers Union v. Crescent City (111 U. S., 746; 28 Law Ed., 585), Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46; 51 Law Ed., 956).

I direct attention specially to the following language on pages 971 and 972 of Fifty-first Law Edition:

Appreciating the force of this, counsel for the Government relies upon "the doctrine of sovereign and inherent power"—

Adding—

"I am aware that in advancing this doctrine I seem to challenge great decisions of the court, and I speak with deference. His argument runs substantially along this line: All legislative power must be vested in either the State or the National Government; no legislative powers belong to a State government other than those which affect solely the internal affairs of that State, consequently all powers which are national in their scope must be found vested in the Congress of the United States. But the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the Nation as a whole which belong to, although not expressed in, the grant of powers is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a Government of enumerated powers. That this is such a Government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the amendments, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specified things made operative to grant other and distinct things. This natural construction of the original body of the Constitution is made absolutely certain by the tenth amendment. This amendment, which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such contention as the present, disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which had not been granted. With equal determination the framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if, in the future, further powers seemed necessary, they should be granted by the people in the manner they had provided for amending that act. It reads:

"'The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.' The argument of council ignores the principal factor in this article, to wit, 'the people.' Its principal purpose was not the distribution of power between the United States and the States, but a reservation to the people of all powers not granted. The preamble of the Constitution declares who framed it, 'we, the people of the United States,' not the people of one State, but the people of all the States, and Article X reserves to the people of all the States the powers not delegated to the United States. The powers affecting the internal affairs of the States not granted to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, and all powers of a national character which are not delegated to the National Government by the Constitution are reserved to the people of the United States. The people who adopted the Constitution knew that in the nature of things they could not foresee all the questions which might arise in the future, all the circumstances which might call for the exercise of further national powers than those granted to the United States, and, after making provision for an amendment to the Constitution by which any needed additional powers would be granted, they reserved to themselves all powers not delegated. This Article X is not to be shorn of its meaning by any narrow or technical construction, but is to be considered fairly and liberally, so as to give effect to its scope and meaning."

CONCLUSION.

While I believe ours to be the best Government yet devised, I am frank enough to say that it is far from perfect. Many changes ought to and will be made as time goes by. These changes should come, however, in an orderly manner and by orderly processes—not by brute force or judicial fraud but in the ways laid down by our fathers for our guidance. When this is done, all is well, and full confidence in the Government remains with the people. Let us, therefore, pursue the course outlined. It is the right one and the only safe one. We can not afford to trade our form of government for this law. Besides whatever of hope for better and more effective enforcement of the law lies not in a centralization of power in Washington but rather in the individual States. They can more fully and completely fulfill their own duties as sovereigns with the least possible Federal interference. The equality of States and the ability of the people of them for self-government and for a discharge of their duties and responsibilities to the National Government must be recognized. Legal autonomy can not exist long in one State or one section and national imperialism in another State or another section. You may feel safe now, but it will not be long before the same ghost will be knocking at your doors, and your acts to-day will surely come back to haunt you.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me I shall make some observations on the stupendous growth of the national debts of the world. Nations did not acquire the "debt habit" until in very recent times. Formerly nations did not spend except out of current receipts. Nations paid as they went. Raising money to defray national expenditures by bond issues for future generations to pay is a strictly modern evil.

I am going to give you some figures. The figures I shall give you on national debts in my discussion are on the authority of Mr. O. P. Austin, formerly Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department and now statistician of the National City Bank of New York. Officers in our Treasury Department regard Mr. Austin as the leading authority on this subject.

I have here a table prepared by Mr. Austin in 1900 while he was Chief of the Bureau of Statistics showing the debts of the principal nations and the aggregate for all nations of the world from 1688 to 1900. I also have a table prepared by him last November showing the debts of 100 principal nations and colonies of the world for the year 1913, preceding the World War, the year 1918, at the close of the war, the year 1919, a year after the war, and the latest available figures for the year 1921. Furthermore, I have a personal letter from Mr. Austin giving aggregate national debts for years not shown in the tables. The figures on national debts I shall give are on the authority of Mr. Austin. Further than that, Mr. Austin should not be held to any responsibility for anything that appears in my remarks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall proceed. It appears from the first table before me that in 1688 Great Britain was the only nation that had acquired the debt habit. That year her national debt was $3,232,636. By 1783 her national debt had increased to $1,126,515,090. That year the following nations had no national debts: Austria, France, Germany, Italy, Netherlands, Turkey, Russia, and the United States. Here are the aggregate national debts of the world for various dates:

1850	9,000,000,000
1874	22,500,000,000
1900	31,201,759,000
1913	43,362,300,000
1918	205,396,000,000
1919	295,070,000,000

The increase of national debts from 1793 to 1874 was largely due to wars which will be readily recalled by every student of history.

During 40 years preceding the World War national indebtedness doubled. During that period there were no costly wars. However, there was feverish activity in the preparation for war, which proved a heavy burden on the national treasuries. This period was one of great activity in development of the new areas of the world. South America, Africa, Canada, Mexico, Australia, and New Zealand show a rapid development in that period in railways and other transportation facilities, and a large portion of such development was met by the Governments, which necessarily contracted large loans for that purpose.

The railways of the whole world in 1874 were about 150,000 miles, and in 1914 over 700,000 miles, of which about one-third was Government owned. Telegraphs were in 1874 but 300,000 miles and in 1914, 1,500,000 miles. Other public improvements during the period were harbors deepened, rivers made navigable, inter-oceanic canals created, and great and costly buildings erected.

Of the 220,000 miles of railway in Europe, about 120,000 are government owned; of the 70,000 miles in Asia, 45,000 are government owned; of the 28,000 miles in Africa, about 17,000 are owned by the Government; of 23,000 miles in Australia, over 20,000 are government owned. All of the telegraph lines of the world, except those in the United States, are owned by the Governments in which they operate.

The wealth of Great Britain in 1865 was $30,000,000,000, and in 1914 it was $80,000,000,000; that of France in 1865 was $25,000,000,000 and in 1914, $70,000,000,000; in the United States in 1860, $16,000,000,000, and in 1914, $250,000,000,000. The world's available wealth practically trebled in the 40 years prior to the World War. During that time the nations were doubling their indebtedness in times of comparative peace.

We come now to the World War, with the national debts of the world, in round numbers, $43,000,000,000. The war was chiefly financed by borrowing. "Pay as you go" found little favor with the war statesmen, although that plan has since been heartily approved for future wars by President Harding in his inaugural address. Naturally one would suppose that when war was over borrowing would cease. I call your attention to the second table referred to, which shows the total national indebtedness in 1918 was $205,000,000,000 and in 1919 $295,000,000,000. The national debts of the world at the end of the year 1921 by a later estimate were a little over $400,000,000,000.

The aggregate national debts are about ten times what they were before the war and about double what they were at the time of the armistice. The United States is the only nation that was in the war that has reduced her national debt in the last two years. Last year Great Britain was the only European nation actively engaged in the war whose expenditures did not exceed receipts.

With the figures before us our national debt is less than 10 per cent of our prewar wealth, that of great Britain a little less than 50 per cent of her prewar wealth, and that of France 73 per cent of her prewar wealth. Among the defeated powers of Austria, Hungary, and Germany each has a national debt in excess of her national wealth. Poland came into existence as a nation since the armistice, but she in some way has piled up a national debt of $69,000,000,000, a sum far in excess of her national wealth.

I urge you to give careful study to these tables which I shall place in the RECORD. How many of these nations will pay their debts? How many of them are insolvent? What per cent of her national wealth can a nation owe without being insolvent? What confronts the European nations—the shackles of the bondholders or bankruptcy?

Our country can and undoubtedly will pay off the national debt in 20 or 25 years. These huge national debts are on the Christian nations of the world. It is the European nations that suggest the query: Can they ever pay? Observe the Asiatic powers with their unlimited power of men and undeveloped resources with practically no national debts. Direct your special attention to Japan, one of the allies in the World War. Her national debt was not materially increased by her participation in the war. Of course, Europe is the center of world chaos financially.

The increase in the national debts of the world from $43,000,000,000 in 1913 to $400,000,000,000 in 1921 is the direct result of the reckless and short-sighted methods of financing the war and represents almost a total economic loss. Furthermore, the debts were contracted on highly inflated values and will be paid in the future—unless repudiation or bankruptcy intervenes—with money very much deflated, thus greatly adding to the burdens of the nations heavily in debt.

Mr. Chairman, the tables to which I referred in the course of my remarks are as follows:

[12] 1915.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Chairman, in every period of depression or liquidation which has occurred in the past the prices of all commodities have suffered a great reduction. It has not been confined to any one thing, such as farm products. For instance, in the depression or panic in the early nineties the prices of all products were greatly reduced, such as shoes, clothing, food, and farm machinery. Everything was low; everything was cheap. Now, during this present depression or liquidation period, farm products have been sacrificed and depressed, but the prices of other products, manufactured stuff, have in large measure been maintained.

I think this is due to organization on the part of these industries, coupled with the fact that a manufacturing concern can shut down. If the price it receives is not satisfactory, it can cease to produce. Now, the farming business can not be shut down. It can not close down. It must go on. And for that reason we have seen a depression, a great cut, a slaughter in the prices of farm products, while the prices of things that the farmers buy have been in large part maintained. That is a situation that calls, I think, for the attention and action of Congress. We are facing a condition now that was never faced before. The situation is unprecedented, and to my mind, gentlemen, we must not hesitate to apply an unprecedented remedy. Our old governmental landmarks have pretty well disappeared, and some things must be done to meet new conditions.

President Harding says it is quite "unthinkable," with the country's vast agricultural resources, that the United States should develop into a distinctly industrial nation, and there should be, he says:

> Some corrective and constructive steps taken to remedy the severe hardships under which so important a portion of our productive citizenship is struggling.

Secretary Wallace says:

> We are approaching that period which comes in the life of every nation when we must determine whether we shall strive for a well-rounded, self-sustaining national life, in which there shall be a fair balance between industry and agriculture, or whether, as have so many nations in the past, we shall sacrifice our agriculture for the building of cities, and expect our food to be produced not by independent farmers but by men and women of the peasant type.

I received to-day copy of a resolution adopted on December 14 by 250 farmers and business men at Minnewaukan, the county seat of Benson County, N. Dak. It reads:

> Resolution and petition.
> We, a body of 250 farmers and business men of Benson County, N. Dak., gathered at the courthouse at Minnewaukan this 14th day of December, 1921, after having for a period of about three hours discussed the bill introduced in Congress on July 12, 1921, known as House bill 7735, the object of which is to stabilize prices on farm produce, came to the conclusion that this bill, if passed, would be of benefit to the producer as well as the consumers of all farm products in the United States; wherefore we petition our Senators and Congressmen to support this measure.
> (Signed) G. A. GILBERTSON,
> JOHN F. RANDALL,
> B. OLSON, > Committee.

This petition was also signed by most of those who attended the meeting—all excepting those who had to go home before the resolution was typed. It refers to the bill introduced by the Member from South Dakota [Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON], designed to protect both the producer and consumer against both overproduction and underproduction.

Mr. Chairman, I know personally many of those who signed this petition, and served with some of them in the State legislature. I know them to be honest, straightforward, thoughtful, intelligent, and dreadfully in earnest. You will observe that the resolution was first discussed for a period of three hours, but before that I know from letters received from time to time that the subject of a price guaranty had been considered by the farmers in their homes and as they met in small groups. The statement contained in the resolution represents their mature judgment. Farmers, as a rule, are cautious, and to some extent conservative. They did not reach this decision hastily and not without sufficient reasons. Some of the reasons are contained in the letter of transmittal of John F. Randall. Mr. Randall is the sheriff. If anyone knows the financial condition of farmers when a panic is on, it is the sheriff. He begins by saying:

> We are hard hit—

Mr. Chairman, there never was a more true statement. He continues:

> something has to be done to save agriculture, and that soon.
> In 1919 I sold my clip of wool for $1,010; in 1920, the hardest times in which to operate a farm and when expenses were the largest, I could not sell my clip of wool at all. So we pooled it at the pool at Fargo, and I just got my returns to-day. I received $164, and the expense to clip and buy twine and sacks for my wool was $50. The amount of wool for each year was practically the same.
> I own 1,100 acres of land. The farm is rented while I am in the sheriff's office. The renter's share of the crop lacked $17 of paying his share of the thrash bill. I paid his help and gave him $200 to winter on. He could pay no expenses. I write this to show you where we are going to, and fast.
> I have a loan coming due. It is on a quarter section without buildings. I can not renew this loan, and the land is over half paid for.
> I believe we should have a guaranteed price for wheat, as it is the only thing that will help this country at this time. The same complaint comes from every town and hamlet in the State.
> We hope you can use your influence to help us get cost plus a reasonable profit, which we have to have if we hope to save the equities we have in what property we have left.

Victor Wardrope, of Leeds, N. Dak., who attended this farmers' meeting, writes to tell of the ruinous conditions on the farms and scores Congress for not remedying the situation. He concludes:

> I have lived in this community all my life and as a barefoot boy helped my parents pick buffalo bones over these prairies before a railroad had entered the county. I have witnessed the ups and down of North Dakota nearly 40 years and have no hesitation in saying that the situation is the worst we have ever seen.
> I am not a pessimist and I am not, as a rule, profane, but anyone who has the welfare of the country at heart and who understands the situation can't help being almighty d—n sore.
> We appreciate the fact that you have been doing and are doing everything that you possibly can in the interests of our farmers. Keep the good work up and go after it stronger than ever. If there is anything we can do out here to lend aid and assistance, please let me know.

Many other farmers have written to me to show the great disparity in the prices of things which they sell and which they buy. Some of them assure me that they are already insolvent, and others say that they are facing bankruptcy.

You men of the East, who are in the majority here, say you are opposed to Government price fixing, and that the farmers' bloc constitutes a menace to the country's welfare—you take the short-sighted and erroneous view that increased prices for farmers will be burdensome to the consumers, whom you represent. Some time you may wake up to the fact that millions of your men will continue to walk the streets of your towns and cities until the purchasing power of the farmers has been restored.

What puzzles me is that your city men always give a sort of intellectual assent to the fact that the basis of all prosperity is agriculture, and then forget all about it when it comes to matters of legislation. Here is a recent weekly business review issued by the Irving National Bank of New York, an authority which you men of the East should respect, from which I quote:

> Roughly, the farmer is now forced to give two bushels of corn, two hogs, two horses, and relatively the same proportion of everything he sells, in exchange for the units of manufactured goods which formerly cost him one bushel of corn, one hog, etc. It is therefore obvious that the farmer can not buy the same quantities of manufactured goods he was able to buy in the five years before the war and that this decrease in the farmer's purchasing power is bound to be reflected in decreased production in manufactures.

Another authority from the East, Mr. Edwin McKnight, of Medina, who has given much study to farm problems, says:

> The population of our country is now about evenly divided, one-half living in the city and the other one-half living in the country. When the price of farm products took such a sudden drop in the fall of 1920, and it has continued to decrease ever since, the purchasing power of one-half of our whole population was and is almost entirely confined to the barest necessities. The stoppage of such an amount of buying has caused the manufacturers to suffer losses, to materially cut down their business, and to lay off their employees. Without wages the purchasing power of these idle men has already been substantially decreased, and as time goes on will become almost nothing.
> In the winter, when coal is costly, and housing is scarce and expensive, much suffering will take place in the cities. The bread lines will be long and continuous, the lodging houses overcrowded, and the soup kitchens well patronized.
> Had the cost plus a profit price for all farm products been received by the farmers in 1920, and since then through intelligent guidance, no conditions such as now exist would distress the population of our cities.

Mr. SLEMP. The gentleman is discussing a very interesting subject. What remedy has he to suggest?

Mr. YOUNG. I am coming to that.

Gentlemen, you are expecting that in some mysterious way agriculture will come back, the same as after the panic of 1893. You will wait in vain.

Agriculture is not coming back.

Conditions have changed since 1893. The door was open then. It is closed now.

The farmer can not pull himself up by his own boot straps. Nobody knows that better than the farmers. You men from the East, and those you represent, do not seem to sense it. You can prophesy good times are coming until your faces become blood red, but they will not come until the farmers are placed on a cost-of-production basis. That can only be accomplished by one of two things:

(1) Reduce all other industry to the extremity of agriculture, so that farmers can buy upon the same deflated prices at which they sell, or (2) have the Government, through intelligent acreage control and price guaranty, restore cost-plus prices to the farmers.

I have already called attention to the fact that manufacturers shut down when they can not sell at a profit. Their goods are largely sold in advance.

The farmers produce their goods without any orders on the hook to indicate quantities required or prices obtainable. They have not the slightest idea how much they ought to produce or how much money they will receive.

They produce all they can and have done so ever since history began.

Farmers only know how much they will get after they have hauled their products to market. When they overproduce, they get what their customers are willing to pay, and sometimes discover that they can not sell at any price whatsoever. They transgress every rule of economics.

Manufacturers take the trouble to find out where their goods will be sold, or else do not make them. A manufacturer nowadays who would not do this would be considered crazy.

Then why should farmers continue to produce blindly? There are reasons, of course, but are they unsurmountable? I am inclined to say yes, if left to private resources, but if Government cooperation is given, I believe the problem can be solved.

To secure cost of production plus a profit there must be intelligent crop control, which at this particular time must take the form of crop limitation. I am not prepared to say this could not be brought about by voluntary organization upon the part of the farmers, but the task is stupendous, and if ever possible of accomplishment can not be done soon enough to help the present deplorable and distressing conditions.

Throughout the war there was a scarcity of wheat, and the United States Grain Corporation found a ready market for all available wheat grown in this country. The war operated to prevent overproduction. It is different now. It would require an immense sum of money to fix and maintain prices under present conditions if no attempt were made to curtail production. Upon the other hand, it can be done in time of peace as well as in time of war if the Government will resolutely take hold of the problem and control the production. All it requires is organization. In a sense it is difficult, but with the great organization of the Department of Agriculture available the work of limiting production can be successfully carried out.

The Representative from South Dakota [Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON] has devoted a large amount of time to the solution of this subject, and proposed as a remedy H. R. 7735. This is the bill approved by the Benson County farmers.

There are also some excellent points in the bill introduced by my colleague from North Dakota [Mr. SINCLAIR]. I believe it is entirely possible by taking portions of both of these bills and the addition of some amendments to safeguard the entire plan of crop and price control in such a way as to make it entirely workable and confer great blessings upon both producers and consumers. This plan would involve the revival and enlargement of powers of the United States Grain Corporation.

There are three big things which the Department of Agriculture should do: Show how to produce, determine how much to produce, and how to sell it. About all they have done up to date is to show how to produce. It would require comparatively little more money to accomplish all of them.

The Department of Agriculture of the future must play a new rôle. It must meet the requirements of new conditions. To my mind, it must be completely reorganized in order to put in the forefront of its activities:

First. Crop control; and Second. Sale of farm products.

We appropriate annually enough money to handle such an organization. It should be spent in different channels.

Mr. Chairman, while I would be willing to accept emergency legislation rather than none at all, I believe we should place permanent price and crop control legislation on the statute books. Why should a great Nation, with the welfare of over 100,000,000 people at stake, wait until a panic occurs before taking action.

The lack of a market for our surplus farm products may not remain temporary; a dispatch announced to-day by the Department of Commerce from Alfred P. Dennis, commercial attaché at London, declares that Europe is fast pulling up to the prewar production in foodstuffs.

The after effects of the war constitute only one element in the hazards of farm producers. They are subject to hail, hot winds, cyclones, excessive moisture, drought, insect pests, and noxious weeds. So we ought to legislate on account of the ordinary crop hazards, which we shall always have, rather than confine our legislation to meet an emergency created by the World War.

A permanent policy would be advantageous in many ways. The problem of financing agriculture would vanish. If bankers knew that the lottery of farm prices had been removed, they would readily finance all farm activities. If the guaranteed price were to take into account the elements of interest and storage, so that it would make no difference when delivered, the different crops would come on the market in an orderly manner to the benefit of the entire people.

The problem of carrying over a surplus from one year to another would not make the farmers or tradesmen nervous, because the crop acreage for the following year, being under Government control, could be reduced so as to absorb the surplus.

This plan would also deal a cruel blow to the speculators.

Distribution costs would be reduced by the elimination of some of the middlemen. This would benefit both producers and consumers.

All costs of food products would tend toward stabilization. For instance, flour is likely to go up quickly with the price of wheat, but the retailers are slow to reduce the price after wheat has suffered a decline.

The wheat gamblers on the big exchanges would fold their tents and depart. The flour millers would not need them for price-fluctuation insurance, nor would the growers.

The purchasing power of farmers would be constant and not subject to sudden change by reason of everything in the long list from crop hazards to market manipulations. This would spell good business for all others in our Nation.

This is, of course, all predicated upon the idea of having the Government take hold of it resolutely and make the plan of acreage and price control and salesmanship the very heart of the Department of Agriculture, and not simply a side show.

It should be kept in mind that it would only be the surplus which the Government corporation need buy in order to fix the price, and in case of doing so would only have to carry it for a limited period, because by acreage control a vacuum could be created the following year which would take up the surplus. A corporation with such powers and under such circumstances should be able to borrow the money upon the security of the surplus carried over in storage, and thus save the United States Treasury. It can be done and without much burden upon the National Treasury.

Gen. Hancock was not the first nor the last man to discover that the ordinary citizen is apt to view public questions from the local or sectional standpoint. The problem of the Nation's food supply ought not to be approached from a sectional viewpoint. A thorough study of the whole subject from the broad standpoint of the welfare of our entire country will confirm the view that farmers should be assured the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. Unless that is done American farming will never be on a sound foundation nor the Republic secure.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in the first place I certainly want to offer words of congratulation to the subcommittee having in charge the preparation of this bill for the very splendid way in which they have discharged the duty imposed upon them. The hearings of subcommittees in the preparation of bills are not ordinarily considered to be particularly fascinating reading, but, for the comfort and consolation of this subcommittee, may I say that upon securing a copy of the hearings a few days ago I sat down and went through them from beginning to end with all the interest that I would have in the reading of a story. And so, Mr. Chairman, I desire to congratulate most sincerely this committee upon the excellent work they have done both in the preparation of the bill and in the very careful and painstaking way in which they went into every detail of every item of appropriation.

In connection with the discussion this afternoon, I notice that a number of Members have continuously referred to the idea of deficit, and I desire to call the attention of the committee to a use of the term "deficit" with reference to the matter of the Post Office appropriations which is not applied to any other appropriation bill. If we use the term "deficit" as we use it ordinarily in connection with the other appropriations voted by the House, all the appropriations, all the expenditures in other bills should be regarded as a deficit. Really, if we do use the word "deficit" in its proper application here it would be only a small amount, as Government amounts go, of a few million dollars, and that, as weighed over against the tremendous importance of the work done by this department, ought certainly not to cause any great amount of concern.

This afternoon in the course of a colloquy that took place here between a distinguished member of this subcommittee and myself—I would hardly say it took place between us; I do not flatter myself with that statement, but it occurred during the time the distinguished gentleman was speaking—I was so completely carried away by his eloquence that I could not frame my thoughts and give him an intelligent answer to his very pertinent question as to "where I would save." Inasmuch as he has honored me with his presence at this time, I will undertake to answer the question now.

I said, as best I can recall, that certainly if I were called upon to save in any governmental expenditures, it would not be in connection with the splendid delivery service rendered by the men who do the dray-horse work in connection with the Post Office Department. If I recall correctly, he made the statement, in direct contradiction to this, that there would be the place that he would save, and declared that the salaries of all the rural letter carriers and city delivery carriers are altogether too high at the present time.

In view of that statement and in view of my reply, I have had a little time to gather a few thoughts upon this matter, and I desire to present them at this time. Where would I save in connection with governmental expenditures? If I undertook to go at it in an orderly manner, I would first find out where we spend our money, and with that idea in mind, I refreshed my memory with some figures that I gathered a few days ago. I find that since the establishment of the Government, and extending over the period of our entire history since the adoption of the Constitution, that 78½ per cent of all the money that has been spent by the United States Government has been spent on wars or things relating to and resulting from wars, and that 21½ per cent has been spent in all other disbursements.

If we add to the money thus actually expended the amount of indebtedness which has been incurred, all of which, I think we all agree, has been incurred on war account, the tremendous total rises to 84 per cent. In other words, all the money we have expended in 131 years of our history on war account, together with the obligations we have yet to discharge, amounts to the stupendous sum of seventy-seven and one-tenth billions of dollars in contrast with fourteen and one-tenth billions spent for all other purposes. Answering the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] directly, I would say that I would proceed as the Republican Party to-day is proceeding, through the calling of the great world conference that has had our attention lately, to institute an inquiry and take a definite step, to come down out of the clouds of theory and idealism, and begin at something actually practical in the way of accomplishing some reduction in governmental expenditures. I trust that this, in a way at least, will be an intelligent answer to the question directed this afternoon.

Because of the statements, rather reflecting, it seems to me, upon the service that is rendered by at least two splendid groups of our public servants, namely, the city letter carriers and the rural letter carriers, I hope I may be permitted to make this statement in that connection, that it seems to me when we consider the work performed by the 39,144 city letter carriers who are paid the tremendously large (?) sum of $1,722 per year, out of which they support their families and try to live according to the standards that we want to see the servants of this Government live under; when I recall, I say, this tremendous amount that is expended, I certainly would have to think a considerable number of times before I would begin my policy of governmental retrenchment at this point.

With reference to the men who drive the rural free delivery routes, when I realize that 43,642 of these men go out on days, for instance, like yesterday, on all kinds of roads and in all kinds of weather, and that they supply six and one-half million families throughout the country, or a total of over 30,000,000 of our people, with facilities of mail that bring those people in active touch with the great movements of the world, certainly I would think many times before I began my policy of Government retrenchment at that particular point.

Some time in the future I think some historian, as he writes the history of this country, will notice a particular development that began along about the close of the last century and at the beginning of this. It might properly be called the renaissance of the people who live in the open country—a new birth, a new beginning in their life, a new attraction to country life. When he undertakes to trace out the cause of this new birth, this new beginning, this fine opening of a period of progress in connection with country life, I think undoubtedly he will trace it very largely to the free rural delivery of mail, and certainly no impairment of this service, no desire to retrench at that particular point, seems to me to be worthy of consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. KETCHAM. May I have one additional minute?

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for one additional minute.

Mr. KETCHAM. I desire to take that additional minute to read into the RECORD this tribute, paid to those who do the work of the Postal Service, and surely my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] will not designate this as demagogy:

> The Postal Service is the heart pumping the blood through the veins and arteries of our national life. It makes a thousand scattered communities into a State; it makes 48 scattered States into a Nation. Through the printed matter it carries it brings the joys, the sorrows, the crimes, and the achievements, the political, social, economic, and religious theories and experiences of the whole people before each minute portion of it; to instruct, to inspire, or to horrify; sweeping away sectional lines and breaking up religious prejudices; molding political thought and building political parties; advancing good causes, checking dangerous tendencies. Without it business would languish in a day and be at a standstill in a week. Public opinion would die of dry rot. Sectionalism only would flourish and provincialism thrive.

This is the work of the Post Office Department, as pictured by its brilliant and able head, Postmaster General Hays, and I am certainly willing now to say again, with all the strength I have, that if asked to retrench in governmental expenditures, it would not be done in connection with the work of this splendid department, and I therefore expect to vote for the splendid measure which has been reported by this very able subcommittee. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, elections are public affairs, participation in them a public duty. I want to take the time allotted to me to call the attention of the Members of the House to the need of a new corrupt practice act for election of Senators and Representatives. The present law has been enacted in piecemeal in 1907, in 1909, in 1910, in 1911, in 1912, and in 1918. The law, while it has taken a long time to be placed on the statute books, was knocked out in May of last year by the so-called Newberry case. Money and means should not be the first and primary qualification for an election to either House of Congress. Purchase of power reflects both upon the Government and he who derives that power. We should put on the statute books a new law. It should be such a law as will protect a qualified man against one who as his first qualification seeks a seat in Congress through corrupt methods.

I have introduced a bill in Congress, known as H. R. 9720, to reenact a corrupt practice act that will apply to elections. Congress is without power to legislate as to primaries. This bill takes from the States the right to limit campaign expenditures in the election of Senators and Representatives. In one State the limit is $500, in another $750, and in some States there is no limit at all. In some States we have a corrupt practice act and in other States we have none. We should provide a uniform rule, so that a Member from Maine and a Member from Texas should each be limited to a certain amount of expenditures in elections. By passing a uniform corrupt practice act as to elections we will encourage the States to pass similar laws as to primary elections.

Under the decision in the Newberry case the State only has the right to legislate as to primaries and conventions. I have provided in this bill a section that will prohibit again the unfortunate episode that is now being enacted in the Senate. It is provided that before any friend of a candidate can expend a cent he must obtain the written consent of the candidate, and that expenditure by others is counted in the limit that may be used in the election.

Another provision in the act is this, that if a man goes out and willfully violates the provisions of the Federal act each House of Congress has the authority to unseat that man and may seat the man receiving the next highest number of votes. We must put a law on the statute books for the coming election. The people of this country will not put their stamp of approval on the party that hinders or delays the enactment of a law that purifies elections and eliminates the buying of seats in Congress.

I believe it is the duty of every Member of the House to urge a prompt and quick action and to put a law on the statute books so that it will be ready for the election this fall. My bill also provides that the total amount permitted to be expended by a candidate and his friends for his election shall be based upon 3 cents per vote for the total number of votes cast for all candidates for said office at the last general or special election, with a maximum and a minimum for the Senate of $25,000 and $10,000, and for the House of $4,000 and $2,000. A penalty provision is inserted in the bill that will make it effective, and violators may be punished in Federal courts by Federal officials. Let us preserve the integrity of the ballot by the prompt enactment of a new Federal corrupt practice act.

Mr. SLEMP. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I had 12 minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on December 17, 1921, while discussing the efforts of the Committee on Appropriations to economize and the wasteful, extravagant action of Congress in voting the people's money out of the Public Treasury in $20,000,000 blocks to relieve the Lenin and Trotski bolsheviks and communists of Russia, the chairman [Mr. MADDEN] had this to say:

> Mr. MADDEN. * * * You are coming into the House and spending millions where we are saving dollars. Do we hope by this method to be able to reduce the cost of Government? I do not believe we can. And for myself, I wish I could say what I know to be the facts. I would not dare say it, but I do know of conditions in America that would appall the Congress and the people if they dared to be told. Knowing them as I do——
> Mr. COCKRAN. Why should we not know?
> Mr. MADDEN (continuing). From confidential information given to me I can not see my way to vote a dollar out of the Treasury of the United States to be paid for any purpose that does not mean a relief to the conditions of the people in the Nation which we are sworn to serve.

Mr. Chairman, it is certainly a serious situation when the people of the United States can not be told the facts concerning the financial condition of their own business. And it is certainly a most precarious situation when even the Representatives of the people in Congress are given to understand that even they can not be trusted with this grave knowledge.

I respectfully protest, Mr. Chairman, against any such doctrine. I submit that it is the duty of every Representative of the people to know every fact existent concerning the business of his Government, and, as he is but a mere servant of the people, it is his duty to impart such information about their own business to the people of this Nation. They are entitled to know the facts.

Let me illustrate how the people are kept in ignorance of what is going on in Washington. On January 4, 1922, after Chairman IRELAND had called up his measure to use the people's money in employing cooks and waiters and to pay the losses of the House restaurant, the following occurred:

> Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
> Mr. IRELAND. After making a preliminary statement.
> Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman give me a little time on this resolution to oppose it?
> Mr. IRELAND. If the gentleman desires it, but I would like to get through as early as possible, and I would rather not yield the floor.

And without yielding the floor, after assuring Members that his committee intended to make the House restaurant equal that of the Senate, the chairman moved the previous question, which would have prevented any debate, the following occurring:

> Mr. IRELAND. We hope to bring ours up to the standard of the Senate, Mr. Speaker. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.
> Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman said he would give me a little time on the resolution. I should like to oppose it.
> Mr. IRELAND. Then the gentleman was in a somnolent condition and did not realize it.
> Mr. BLANTON. I would like to have a little time.
> Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the previous question has been moved.
> Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like for the gentleman from Illinois to yield me five minutes if he will.
> Mr. IRELAND. All right. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

And then, Mr. Chairman, simply because I explained what this measure meant to the people and their Treasury, I was ridiculed, belittled, bemeaned, and laughed at amid great and prolonged applause. I was represented to favor, and my district of 314,000 honest, intelligent, educated, cultured, and high-minded people was represented to use one roller towel a week for a family, simply because I protested against the Government paying part for our meals and have favored taking the barbers and congressional body rubbers off of the pay roll of the Government.

Now, what were the facts about this House of Representatives' restaurant? The Government furnishes rent free the kitchens, the cooking ranges, the refrigerators, the utensils, the fuel and power, the restaurant dining rooms, the fine mirrors that run from the floor to the ceiling, the fine chandeliers, the fine new furniture just installed, the silver, the china, the glassware, the linen tablecloths and napkins, and most of the overhead expense. And this resolution will pay all losses on food and employment of cooks and waiters out of the people's money.

One other gentleman saw fit to get time, five minutes, to speak against this resolution. The distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, to the members of which committee the people of this country are looking for retrenchment, knew the importance of the resolution, and he is a man who is not afraid, and here is what he said on the floor of this House, as found in the RECORD, on page 887:

> Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, the only trouble with the restaurant is that Members of Congress demand too much for their money; it is losing money, and if you make Members pay what they ought to pay this would not be true. So you want to pass this resolution to pay the loss out of the people's pockets—that is, the Treasury. This is a little thing, you say, but the real way to determine the character of a man is found more frequently by considering the little things that he does than the big ones. O gentlemen, this is petty graft.

Now, you understand I am not saying this is petty graft. It is the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] who says that. Were I to say that, possibly I would be in danger of my seat in Congress. The majority leader probably would introduce a resolution to expel me before morning. But it is the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who has had long and distinguished service here, who says that it is petty graft, and I am repeating his language from the RECORD. Continuing, Mr. SISSON said:

If I were going to be a grafter, I would start out with a bigger thing than grafting on the difference between the loss we suffer downstairs and what we pay. O gentlemen, I beg of you do not do this little thing. Let us pay for our own meals. This is such a little thing. It is too cheap a thing for this House to be guilty of.

Now, honest Indian, there is no justification on the face of the earth for having the Government pay the loss incurred in that restaurant. You can not find in your own heart any reason for it. The body at the other end of the Capitol had, some years ago, an expense account that was so bad that they did not dare print it. In the items embraced within the statement of expenses they had "a masseur" at one time, but he is now put on the roll as "a helper," and so on. Why? Because they knew that the people would not stand for it. * * *

You know that the Government of the United States ought not to pay one single cent out of its Treasury to feed you. [Applause.]

And he got applause, and I was the one who applauded him.

Now, I realize that when you talk in the interest of people, even about a little thing like this, you do not get anywhere. The fellow in this case does the voting and enjoys the graft. If you do not think that your salary is big enough to feed you, vote to increase it and quit. You know there is a passage of scripture that is absolutely and everlastingly true, * * * it says that "the love of money is the root of all evil." And it is.

Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asked him if he knew about the appropriation for the special spring water for Congressmen to drink. He admitted knowing of it, and then the gentleman from Illinois asked him if he did not drink the water, and the gentleman declined to yield. That is what we meet with. Every time we go to stop a piece of graft in government we are met with, "Do you not do so-and-so? Are you not paid so-and-so? Are not your perquisites so-and-so?" What are the perquisites of a Congressman? Well, we get our salaries and we get mileage, 20 cents a mile. We Texas men get a mileage check of $700 three times in each Congress. In the war Congress we each got $2,100, in the last Congress $2,100 each. Last April we each got $700 mileage, and in order for us to get another $700 mileage check in December Congress adjourned, as the late Speaker Clark used to say, for prudential reasons, adjourned for 10 days so we could get another $700 mileage check in December. Four of the Texas delegation are bachelors. There are 67 bachelors in this Congress. Thus our four bachelor Members from Texas each get $2,100 a Congress for mileage. That is a valuable asset.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry; I can not yield.

Mr. KELLER. Did you take your check?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a minute. That is the way they come back at you, "Did you not take it?" Why, of course, I took it, because I would be a fool not to take it when it is there to my credit. Nobody else can take it. If I did not take it, who would spend it? There is a voucher issued payable to me for it.

But I say it is these things that ought to be stopped. For instance, all Members of Congress who know about it, who have made an investigation, Democrats and Republicans alike, know that besides the waste and the extravagance of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, that one department of the Government has grafted about $800,000,000 from this Government. We all know it, but when we go to reach these big things we are confronted with these little things that we take ourselves. They say, "Did you not take this and that?" What are the things we take? Oh, we get a free trip to Panama, each one of us, at Government expense, and we can take every member of our family for a little, measly $61 apiece to pay for meals, it says.

Now, this House barber shop. Why should all those barbers there draw $70 a month from the pay roll of this Government, I want to ask you? If it is a proper charge, why do you not put them on the roll as barbers and not as laborers or helpers? They are every one of them drawing $70 a month. Why is it that Bruce over here and William Richardson are still drawing $95 a month from the Government in that House bathroom, and Tompkins, another one of the body rubbers, $78 a month to rub Congressmen when they come back from golf games or other places of amusement? Why should they be paid by the people's money? Why do we not pay them when we want to be rubbed, I ask you? Why, all those fixtures and that furniture in that bathroom and barber shop are paid for by the Government. They are paid for and furnished by the Government.

I have not complained about towels, merely, as was suggested the other day. Why, in the splendid offices that are furnished each one of us, magnificently furnished, we are supplied with a secretary and an extra clerk. We are furnished with the finest furniture and carpets. We are furnished with two typewriting machines. We are furnished everything we need—comb and brush, clothes brushes, soap, hot and cold water, and clean towels every day. And what else? In every Congress each one of us has credited to his account $125 each session for stationery. In the war Congress we each had $375 credited to our account in the stationery room, and in the last Congress $375 each. We have already had $250 credited in this Congress, less than a year old, to each one of us, and we will have another $125 credited next December. What do we do with the $375? What do they keep in the House of Representatives' stationery room for us to buy with it? Let me show you some of the things they keep there in the stationery room for Congressmen of the United States to buy with Government money. It is all right for us to be furnished with official stationery. Why should we be furnished with stationery of this kind? [Exhibiting.] Big box of fine, fancy, lady's stationery. That box down town sells for $6, $8, or $10, but you buy it over here because they buy it at the manufacturer's prices—you buy it for less than $4 over here. What else do they keep over there? Fine desk pads like this, for instance, that sell for $19 at manufacturer's price. The price to the Government is $19. That is kept there for sale. What else is kept there? Take, for instance, carving knives and forks, with steels, like this. What use have we as Congressmen for such truck as that? What else is kept there? Let me see. Now this came from the stationery room. This is a leather-bound poker set, with four decks of cards and full of red and white and blue poker chips. It is in a leather-covered box, and would cost about $25 in the stores in Washington. It is kept there for us Congressmen to buy with Government money. And they furnish you with a dozen extra decks of cards to go with it. [Exhibiting them.]

What else do they furnish? Things of this kind [exhibiting]: Notice the color of the lining, fancy lavender, lady's manicure set; all these pieces, every one of them with pearl handles, that in the stores of Washington would sell for about $40. Over here it sells for about $20. That is what they keep there for Congressmen to buy.

Now, you know they had so much demand for this little article [exhibiting], a pocket pint whisky flask, covered with ostrich-skin leather, during Christmas time that they sold out. What else do they have there? Ladies' bags of this character, covered with genuine ostrich leather, guaranteed, on the outside and fixed up with that character of lining on the inside. At the wholesale manufacturer's price that sells for $22.90. Down town it would cost about $40. You buy it from a paid employee of the Government on the pay roll of the Government, and he sells you articles of that kind on your stationery account!

Now, what else do they keep there? I have a number of things I want to show you that you can buy with Government money on your credit of $375 a Congress in the stationery room. Here is a lady's toilet set with brush, comb, and a big fine mirror.

Mr. CROWTHER. Does the gentleman get any commission for displaying these articles?

Mr. BLANTON. Then they have fine electric chafing dishes that at manufacturers' prices cost about $15, while in the stores of Washington they sell for about $25 or $30. I say, as the gentleman from Mississippi well said, the graft is too little for Congressmen to permit to exist longer. I went to the dean of a delegation after I had been here less than six months, a man who is honest, a man in whom I have the utmost confidence, and I said, "John, we have got to stop this, and we will stop it." He laughed at me. He says, "Tom, this was here 50 years before you and I got here. It was here when I came here, nearly 20 years ago, and it was here when you got here. You had better let it alone." He says, "If you ever get up on the floor of the House and say anything against it, they will call you a demagogue," and they did. He knew what he was talking about.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I decline to yield. He told me that neither I nor any one man could stop it. He told me the truth. I can not stop it, but I am here to tell you that I am going to try to stop it. I am here to tell you that if I can get enough of you men to vote with me we can stop every bit of it tomorrow. We could stop all of these items I have mentioned, as well as the restaurant expense that the gentleman from Mississippi denominated as petty graft, and we would feel better, we would be in a better position to face and fight the big graft in this Government, the hundred million dollars in the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. We could come with a better heart and a better grace and stand up like men when we say that we are going to stop it.

I know that whenever a man gets up here and says anything against these things he is placed in the attitude of being holier than thou; he is placed in the attitude of trying to hold himself out as more honest and honorable than his colleagues. I do not pretend any such thing. I do not pretend to be any more honorable or honest than my colleagues, but I do pretend to have nerve enough to stand up on this floor and tell you that we ought to stop it, even if we do personally profit by it. The time has come in the history of this Government when the people ought to know more about their business. They are entitled to know more about their business. We have no right to furnish ourselves with barber shop accommodations at the expense of the Government. We have no right to furnish ourselves with masseurs and manicurists and men to rub us when we come in from the golf fields. We have no right to call upon the Government to furnish all overhead expense for our eats in the restaurant. It ought to be on a commercial basis. We ought to pay just what everybody else pays—we ought to walk up like men and pay our bills and not ask the Government to stand it.

Oh, the gentleman said that he was going to have this House restaurant equal that of the Senate. That was his object in passing the resolution. Let me show you what you will have to do if you equal the Senate. Here is the menu, and I want you to remember that the purpose of the chairman in passing the resolution was stated to be, because sometimes the House would adjourn and all of the food down there would be left on the hands of the restaurant and would spoil. Some one asked him if they could not protect it by a refrigerator, and he said no; that it would spoil; that they had not been able to protect it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield now. I have not the time. He said that it would spoil, and he said that no private institution could afford to stand the waste and stay in business, but the Government has got to stand the waste and the people have to pay the bill. Let me show you how much food is put up for one meal that would have to be wasted if we adjourned and did not eat it, if we were to equal the Senate restaurant. Here is a menu of the Senate restaurant for January 10, 1922, the day before yesterday. At the bottom of it is printed "No tips allowed." Do you know why? Because the employees are paid by the Government. You are letting the Government pay your tips even. Let us see what the food is:

Mr. CABLE. How about the prices?

Mr. BLANTON. I am illustrating wastage now. Are the people cognizant of the fact that we are putting up all that food at their expense, partly? Are they willing to bear the losses, or is it right that they should do it, I ask you?

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute. Is it right that they should do it? When the Congressman said that I could not stop it, I will tell you what else I asked him. I then asked him how on earth we could go back to the people and face them unless we did stop it. He said, "TOM, I tell you what I did. I went down and told my people about every graft that there is up here. I told them about every one of them, and I told them that I could not stop them and that nobody else could." I am now doing what he did—telling the people of this country about it.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. KING. I just want to ask the gentleman if he will not put in the prices, so as to show the people of the country that we are paying for them, so that it will not appear that we are getting this for nothing.

Mr. BLANTON. I will do that if the gentleman will get permission from the House to permit me to put in in connection with it the menus for the same day from the first-class restaurants of Washington, so that the people may compare the prices. Let my colleague get permission to do it, and I will then put them all in, and you may see the difference between the Hotel Raleigh and the Hotel Willard and the prices contained in this menu. I was illustrating wastage merely in the variety of food.

Oh, but it was said on the floor here the other day that I was raising an objection to the restaurant bill and this barber shop and other matters because I wanted votes. It was charged that I was after votes in Texas. Let me tell you something, and let me tell the good Member from Oklahoma, who said that on the floor, just watch the next election reports and you will find that there will not be a Member in Congress here who gets more votes than I shall get in the seventeenth district of Texas in the next election, not one of them. If your people will stand by you just like my people will stand by me, you will get the biggest majority that any Congressman ever received. It is not to get votes, and you people know it. I know how I stand with my people; I know where I stand. Somebody said, "Oh, BLANTON is a candidate for the United States Senate." I would be if I were able financially to do it, but I am not, and I am not going to run for the Senate. I state that to the people who have been fearful that I would run. I am not going to run for the Senate, because I am not able to campaign the State.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CABLE. If the gentleman will help me put through a bill, he will be able to run, a corrupt practices bill, limiting the amount of the expense.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, we have a corrupt practices act in Texas that limits the expense to $5,000, and yet one governor of Texas had spent for him $78,000 to be elected not long ago—not the present governor, but another one—and $5,000 is a big sum for a poor man.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH, having taken the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9859, the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office appropriation bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Post Office appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, January 13, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 13, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. WALSH as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, every daydawn awakens the echo of Thy merciful Providence. It is a miracle of Thy great love, so glorious and so impartial. May we lay hold of this truth and hide it away in our hearts. O direct us to hallow all our days with a due recognition of Thee as our Creator, whom we love to call "Father," and of our God in whose wisdom our Republic was conceived. Always bestow upon us the treasures of Thy truth, and may it be our authority and our guide. O let fall upon our loved ones the sweet benedictions of Thy spirit, through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ECONOMIC SITUATION OF FRANCE.

Mr. McFADDEN rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. McFADDEN. Last evening it was my good fortune to attend a meeting of financial men and bankers in Philadelphia. There was delivered at that meeting an address by Hon. Maurice Casenave, the financial expert to the Disarmament Conference here, representing the French Republic, in which he deals with the economic and political rehabilitation of France; and because of the important statements which he has made, and in view of the legislative matters here pending, including the refunding of the public debt and our loans to foreign countries, I believe it is extremely important for the House to have this information. I therefore ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing this speech, which was delivered in Philadelphia last evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting in the RECORD a speech made at Philadelphia last evening. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the address referred to:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY THE HON. MAURICE CASENAVE TO GROUP 1 OF THE PENNSYLVANIA BANKERS' ASSOCIATION AT ITS DINNER HELD AT THE BELLEVUE-STRATFORD IN PHILADELPHIA ON THE EVENING OF THURSDAY, THE 12TH OF JANUARY, 1922.

GENTLEMEN: I am most appreciative of the opportunity which the Pennsylvania Bankers' Association affords me of speaking on the economic situation of France. This situation is of world-wide interest; all nations are connected with each other as are connected liquid-containing vases, the contents of which is common to the others.

At the present time the most important of all problems in France is reconstruction. This complicated problem embraces all economic, financial, and social questions, and not the future development only but even the future existence of the nation depends upon its solution.

The direct losses suffered by France during the war are known; about 1,400,000 of her young men were killed, and 700,000 permanently crippled, who have to be supported by the nation for their lifetime. Thus by their death and disablement an important economic factor is eliminated, and the pensions which have to be paid to their families weigh down upon the French budget, and will continue to weigh down upon it, until certain cash payments on account of reparations are paid into our national treasury.

The material destructions suffered by France have been estimated, after careful study, at about $12,000,000,000 gold, to which must be added the total of the pensions which have to be paid to the families of the dead or incapacitated soldiers, and which have been capitalized at about $12,000,000,000 also.

The French debt has risen from $7,000,000,000 to $60,000,000,000, of which more than $6,000,000,000 are foreign debt due to the United States and Great Britain.

Moreover, there are some losses to which references are seldom made, and which have increased the economic difficulties of France. Before the war France was close to being the greatest lender to foreign nations. Foreign nations had acquired the habit of coming to France in order to issue loans for national expenses, public works, or even private industrial enterprises. The proverbial thrift of the French people has helped to construct railways in the United States, Italy, Argentina, Brazil. These loans were made at a rate of interest averaging under 5 per cent. French money was lent to the Imperial Russian Government to an amount exceeding $2,500,000,000, and to Russian railways and mining and industrial enterprises to the extent of about $1,500,000,000. These loans made to Russia have undoubtedly been of use to France, as they have permitted the building of the former Russian Army, whose opportune diversion on the eastern front helped us to win the Battle of the Marne. But at the present time they seem to be greatly endangered, and although they may be recuperated when principles of honesty prevail in Russia, they do not actually bring any income at a moment when any income would be most helpful to France.

In the Balkans France has invested money in a similar manner in Rumania, Serbia, Bulgaria, Greece, and Turkey to an amount of over $1,000,000,000. These investments seem even more dangerously imperiled than the loans made in Russia, as these last-mentioned nations are comparatively poor. It seems very doubtful that their prewar indebtedness can ever be collected, inasmuch as some of these nations—Rumania, Serbia, and Greece—have increased their debt to France during the war. The sums advanced by France to her allies exceed 14,000,000,000 francs. As the franc during the war was always maintained near its par value, these sums exceed by about $500,000,000 the sums which were advanced to France at the same time by the United States.

The thrift of France, which manifested itself by lending money for the development of the world, must now manifest itself to provide for the necessary expenditures, as alloted every year in the budget, to repair French losses and to create new riches, thereby to enable us to comply with our national obligations.

France has to provide for expenditures of a different nature:

1. Expenditures necessary for the upkeep of the Government, national debts, administration, public works, army, navy, etc. They are of a permanent character and repeated every year. What we call in France the "ordinary budget" provides for them.

2. Expenditures to meet transitory necessities, which once paid for will not be renewed; for example, expenses paid in the Near East or Morocco. These expenses are essentially temporary and form the "extraordinary budget."

These two budgets for 1922 total about 25,000,000,000 francs. After every possible compression these budgets are about 2,000,000,000 francs less than the corresponding budgets for 1921. With the exception of a deficit of about 1,000,000,000 francs, which has to be covered by loan, both "ordinary" and "extraordinary" budgets are covered by taxes.

Considering the general condition of the world, this deficit of 1,000,000,000 francs does not seem so exaggerated. The United States are facing even a larger deficit. Before the war the northern departments paid one-fifth of the total amount of the taxes paid by France. Three years only have elapsed since the cessation of the hostilities, the population of these departments having not yet recuperated from the ruins caused by the Germans, can not be taxed at this time. Owing to the world crisis, the turnover tax, considered as the most just and most scientific of all taxes, is far from bringing in France, as in any other country, the expected returns. In this connection, I dare make the remark that the French people pay more taxes than is generally believed in this country. Calculations have been made by the financial organization of the League of Nations of the taxation per capita in the principal countries of the world. This calculation does not refer to income tax only, but includes the proceeds of all taxation, direct or indirect. According to this calculation, England is taxed 26 per cent, United States 8 per cent, France 19 per cent, and Germany only 12 per cent of the revenue per capita. In this country I often heard just complaints made from a purely business point of view about the inconveniences of overtaxation. It seems to me that these inconveniences should be felt even more in France, who has suffered so much from the war, than in the United States, which are certainly in a much better financial position.

In any case, considering the present conditions, one may rest assured that as soon as restoration of our devastated regions has been achieved and as soon as the general conditions of business in the world have been improved the French budget will be balanced by taxation only.

Especially more so, as some of the expenditures of the extraordinary budget are only temporary; for example, our expenses in the Near East, which are the consequences of a mandate provided by the treaty of Versailles.

France, as a European nation with long tradition and located in the midst of all European difficulties, is not in a position to reject mandates. The only thing which she can do is to exercise these mandates so as to make them as inexpensive and as peaceful as possible. This she succeeded in doing in the Near East by the recent negotiations in Angora which, although being the object of criticism, nevertheless brought to the problem involved a solution less expensive than the continuance of war.

To sum up, I feel quite certain that, considering the difficulties confronting France, her "ordinary" and "extraordinary" budgets are in the best possible condition.

There is a third kind of expenses which are incurred for reconstruction and for the paying of pensions. These expenses have been incorporated under the name of "Budget of expenses to be recuperated from Germany." This incorporation is misleading; it is made for reference only. Properly speaking, these expenses are foreign to any budget.

They constitute an account opened by the French treasury to record the indemnities advanced by the French Government to the victims of the war, and which, in compliance with the Versailles treaty, are to be paid by the Germans. As it would be too odious to impose taxation on the victims for reparations of the wrong done by a destructor because of his reluctance to pay, these advances can not be considered as budgetary expenses, to be covered by taxation.

Notwithstanding the fact that Germany did not pay for the wrong she has done, it was of absolute necessity to bring the families, the population, back to their homes; to rebuild the towns, churches, and schools; to give the people means of existence; to restore the fields; reconstruct the farms and manufacturing plants; to put the mines into operation. This was of primary importance, as France was depending upon the devastated regions for large quantities of wheat, sugar, coal, and textiles. Until these regions brought returns France was compelled to buy a corresponding amount of raw materials in foreign countries at an adversed rate of exchange.

Under those difficult conditions, while awaiting payments from Germany, the French Government began financing reparations out of the resources of France. Of course, if one considers that certain of the goods necessary for reparations have to be purchased abroad it is readily understood that the cost of reconstruction is weighing heavily upon France, as the exchange is now against the franc and as the purchasing power of money in general has been greatly deteriorated.

In spite of these adverse conditions a sound and provident reconstruction began, the part most apt to produce riches receiving first attention, and now 95 per cent of the fields are cultivated, 75 per cent of the manufacturing plants are in operation; everywhere one can see fields covered with crops and newly equipped factories surrounded by huts in which employers and employees alike live in hardship. The spirit of the farmers, laborers, and of the people in general can be compared with the spirit of the pioneers, for they give no thought to the hardship of their daily life, having only one thought, the work to be done.

Thus since the armistice about 50,000,000,000 francs have been provided by the French Government for reparations and pensions. To cover these enormous sums—which, as I insisted above, should not be covered by taxation—the French Government appealed to the public by direct loans and by indirect loans floated by a bank, the "Crédit National," created especially for the purpose. Others were issued by corporations established with the object of using the organized credit of the devastated populations themselves.

But the sums required reached such a figure that it was an impossible task to raise them out of the savings of the country. Consolidated loans would have meant, to say the least, a very slow process, and reconstruction had to be made quickly.

At first the circulation of the "Banque de France" had been increased; but the Government, considering that this inflation was endangering public credit, put an end to the issue of such notes. For the past two years, instead of printing notes in conformity with the German system, not only has inflation of the notes of the bank been completely stopped in France but circulation of outstanding notes has been reduced by more than 2,000,000,000 francs.

With the view of providing for reconstruction the Government had recourse to another process. It framed a mean of mobilization of all the working funds of all the responsibilities of France, by issuing treasury bills. The Government has been reproached for having issued these treasury bills; however, thanks to these treasury bills, the 50,000,000,000 francs needed could be raised and a large part of reconstruction has been made in spite of the slowness with which Germany has made her payments.

If one can judge a financial policy by its social results, one can not help noticing that in France there are less strikes than in some other countries, even in those less hurt by the war than we have been; in France everyone goes to his work peacefully; recent statistics spoke about 14,000 unemployed, this out of a population of 40,000,000.

I must lay stress on the fact that payments made for reparations are only advances which ultimately must be met by Germany. Contrarily to prevailing rumors, France from the beginning tried to organize a practical settlement of reparations with the Allies as well as with Germany; attempts in this direction were made in December, 1920, and in January, 1921, but the attitude of the German Cabinet, then presided over by Mr. Fahrenback, was such that it did not permit the application of the elaborated scheme. Germany ceded only to an ultimatum which was served together with the menace of the occupation of the Ruhr and of some economic sanctions. These sanctions were lifted at the first manifestation of good will shown by the Germans and the French minister of the liberated regions, Mr. Loucheur, signed an agreement in August last, at Wiesbaden, to provide for payments in goods.

The terms of the Wiesbaden agreement lay down a modus vivendi whereby a committee or possibly a corporation will be established in France to represent all the French sufferers of war damages. This corporation will receive orders from these sufferers for whatever materials they may require for reconstruction. These orders may be placed up to 1,000,000 gold marks per annum. They will be handed by the French committee or corporation to a committee or corporation of Germans which will represent all the leading German manufacturers of all types of materials. The payment for these materials in Germany will be made at the price of materials bought on the French internal market.

The German committee or corporation opens a credit in Germany on behalf of the French committee or corporation of an amount of 7,000,000,000 gold marks. This credit will be repaid in 1936. So as to permit rapid reconstruction with the goods to be purchased with this credit, these will have to be delivered up to the value of the full amount of the credit before May 1, 1936.

The German seller is paid by the German organization; the amount of each payment so made is placed to the credit of the German Government and is deducted from the German debt according to the maturities of the said debts. Interest at 5 per cent will be paid to Germany because of the anticipated payments which she is to make. If in 1936, the date of the maturity of the said credit, the rights of France to indemnity have not reached the sum of 7,000,000,000 gold marks, France shall pay in cash the difference between the amount of the indemnity due her and the said sum of seven billions.

One can see that this agreement has the great advantage of bringing the question of reparations from the financial to the economic ground. It begins a collaboration with the living, working Germany; with the part of Germany which honestly wants to pay its debts. By that fact, it is the most momentous of all negotiations since the Versailles treaty. It proves that France does not seek to ruin Germany, as some people try to persuade the world, which they deem simple-minded enough to believe that a creditor is stupid enough to seek the ruin of his debtor.

Because it seems to interfere with payments due to other allies, the Wiesbaden agreement has not yet been put into execution; but it seems to indicate a new spirit. It is undeniable that Europe is beginning to reconstruct herself morally; this condition is necessary for her material reconstruction. A young nation, like the American people, is not always apt to understand the virtue of time as a healer of moral wounds; this healing is beginning to take effect on the health of Europe.

The fact which can not be overemphasized is that at the present time the only desire of France is for peace. Peace is the main factor of France's financial and economical reconstruction; armaments are one of our greatest expenses, and since the termination of the war our constant effort has been to reduce them. This is the reason why France was the first to welcome, with the utmost sympathy, the proposal of a conference for the limitation of armaments when it was called by President Harding.

But in order to be fully effective peace can not be separated from security in the minds of the people of France. France as a nation has a long past and a long history. Owing to her geographical position, it took long and bloody wars to build and to preserve her national unity. In the last 50 years France has been invaded twice—in 1870 and in 1914.

It is obvious that the mere thought that the horrors of these times could reoccur is sufficient to alarm the French people. Our history teaches us another lesson. In 1807, after the Battle of Jena, Emperor Napoleon, then dominating Europe, and having all the potentates as his confederates, tried to annihilate the military power of Prussia. However, by the underhanded and indefatigable work of her Government and people, Prussia succeeded in building a militaristic organization so promptly that six years later she was in a position to send the strong army which decided the fate of the Battle of Waterloo.

To be certain that such a nation as Germany is no longer a menace to France one has to have proofs that she is disarmed morally as well as materially, and that she is ready to pay for the wrong which she has committed. In the laboring and most-honest classes there seems to be signs of repentance. But anyone returning from Germany is impressed by the fact that the great magnates of industry and the former junker classes are filled with the spirit of vengeance only. Can France run the risk of another attack?

During the negotiations for peace, in order to protect ourselves against future invasions, some of our great generals who enjoyed the confidence of the French people who they had saved, advised France to exact from Germany forever the frontier of the Rhine. More cold-blooded advice came from the allied nations. Their representatives promised the French people that their help would again be given in case of another attack. France believed in them and refused to heed the advice of her military chiefs. Circumstances, which it is useless to recall, proved that France had to rely solely upon her own army to protect a frontier which had proved inefficient in 1870.

In spite of the fact that Germany in the last war was not invaded as we were in 1870, and that three years have passed since the cessation of the hostilities, Germany is far from having paid us half of what we in 1870 had paid to Germany in one year. In order to insure by our own means the protection of our frontier and to secure the fulfillment of obligations which were laid upon us by virtue of the mandates, or which were imposed upon Germany in our favor, we need an army. This army, which is sometimes made a subject to reproach us with, seemed very useful to all, for since the end of the war not long ago, when Poland had been crushed and when Warsaw was menaced by the triumphant armies of bolshevism, what would have become of the world at that time if the army of France had not been ready?

But these times are past and we hope they never will be known again. The bolshevists themselves seem to have reached a more thorough understanding of what nations owe each other. The military power of Germany has undoubtedly been reduced and is at the present time somewhat controlled by interallied commissions; our army need neither be as large nor as important as it was before the war. By comparing the figures for 1922 with those of 1914 one can readily see that the number of men under the French colors has been greatly reduced. To begin these reductions we did not wait for the meeting of the conference for disarmament in Washington; they were anticipated in the projected budget for 1922, which was submitted to the French Chamber of Deputies at the beginning of 1921. Before the war our troops, including those necessary to the defense of our colonies, figured 947,000; according to the budget for 1922 they are reduced to 643,000 men; prior to the war every man was compelled to serve three years in the service; at the present time men are serving only about two years, and ere long the time will be reduced to 18 months.

If we compare the proportion of military expenses to the total expenses we see even a larger reduction. In 1914, out of a total budget of 5,200,000,000 francs, military expenses amounted to 1,435,000,000, or 27 per cent. In 1922, out of a total budget of 24,500,000,000 francs, military expenses amount to 3,700,000,000, or 14 per cent. Of course, in these figures two factors must be considered: First, the reduced purchasing power of the franc and at the same time the increase in the cost of living; second, the increase of our debt, the interest of which is included in the budget.

The above explanations are necessary to enable you to understand the position taken by France at the Washington conference, as well as to show you that France since the end of the war succeeded in reducing her army by one-third.

As regards naval armaments France has recently been reproached with some kind of megalomania and of lavish dilapidation of her finances. At the conference in Washington she spoke of 350,000 tons of capital ships, light cruisers, and 90,000 tons of submarines. This provoked universal disapproval and even indignation; dark designs were suspected; public references were made pretending that certain Frenchmen intended to wage war against our ally, who yesterday fought with us for liberty and civilization.

I am glad that such utterances were made openly; it furnishes an opportunity to clear ourselves of an infamous and stupid suspicion. It is not with the view of attacking anybody that we ask for such a fleet; it is for the very simple reason that a big country must be in a position to rely upon herself, to protect her own coasts, and to assure communications with her overseas possessions. It is for the same reason that the United States and Great Britain, who were never suspected of being militaristic nor megalomaniac, ask for a fleet of 500,000 tons each.

Everyone knows that a fleet which shows on every sea the flag of a big nation is commercially a very important factor in time of peace and that it has a far-reaching effect, as advertisement, toward the development of maritime commerce.

The main reason why the demand of France caused such an emotion in the United States is because the man in the street in America ignores that the total area of the French colonies slightly exceeds that of the United States, Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Philippines combined. Some of our overseas possessions, Algeria, Tunis, Morocco, only at a few hours' distance, really form a part of continental France; others, like Madagascar, an island as large as the State of Texas; Indo-China, which covers an area equal to that of California, Oregon, and Washington States combined, are located at distances varying from 5,500 to 9,000 miles. The islands of Oceania, which number over 100 and which were the object of the recent agreement regarding the Pacific, are located at the Antipodes of France.

The total length of the coasts of the colonies is 7,000 miles. The population figures 60,000,000 inhabitants.

French possessions and colonies are very valuable. Their annual commerce was greatly developed during the war and now exceeds 10,000,000,000 francs a year. They produce large quantities of tropical products, cereals, foodstuffs, metallic ores, and raw materials of every description which otherwise France would have to buy in foreign markets at a rate of exchange very unfavorable to us. We expect our colonies, by producing new wealth for France, to play the same part in our reconstruction as did the western territories in the reconstruction of America after the Civil War.

A large number of the inhabitants of the colonies are either good agriculturists or dairy farmers; some have become excellent mechanics; they are grateful to us for the benefit of the civilization which they receive from us and for the security which they enjoy under French domination.

During the war they helped us with men and money. Over 680,000 fought in the trenches, 238,000 worked in the rear of the army, and 107,000 served as agricultural workers. We need a navy to assure our communications in time of emergency with these important overseas possessions.

Nevertheless, as soon as the armistice was signed, we began reducing our navy, with a view to curtailing our budgetary expenses. The construction of 5 battelships, amounting to 126,000 tons, was stopped; 13 old battleships, totaling 148,000 tons, were scrapped; we gave up the laying down of five replacement units, amounting to 120,000 tons, and of the total program for 1912, amounting to 155,000 tons. Thus the total of our abandonments amount to 544,000 tons long before the call of the United States to the conference had been sent forth. Our naval expenses before the war amounted to 461,000,000 francs, or less than 9 per cent of our total budget; our naval expenses for 1922 provided for 940,000,000, or less than 4 per cent of the total budget.

Moreover, in consideration of the concessions made by others, the French Government showed its willingness to sacrifice a large part of the program of 10 capital ships, which had been prepared by our naval experts and the laying down of which had been postponed; we have agreed to reduce our construction in this connection to 175,000 tons as against 500,000 tons for the United States and England, 350,000 tons for Japan, and 175,000 for Italy. The light cruisers and submarine questions remain open. Having such reduced tonnage of capital ships, we must take other measures to safeguard our communications with our overseas possessions. Such communications have to be made by convoys, so we need light cruisers. The safety of the French coast proper and of the coasts of her colonies must be protected in some way; we need submarines to protect them. But on the proposal of two eminent statesmen, Messrs. Elihu Root and Arthur Balfour, regulations for submarines have been adopted which forever prevent the ruthless use of submarines in time of war.

This is a candid explanatory statement of the situation of France. Lately it has been the subject of so much discussion that I thought it would prove of some interest to you to have it explained from an economic as well as from a political point of view. I hope that you will admit that, under the most trying circumstances which were ever borne by a nation, France has followed a line of conduct in conformity with her past of courage and that the adopted course will be fruitful, bringing in the future peace and prosperity to herself and to the world.

REPORT OF THE AGRICULTURAL INQUIRY.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold for a moment until I make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. KIESS. This will take only a moment. The gentleman can then follow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KIESS, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report (No. 564) to accompany House concurrent resolution 37:

The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the resolution (H. Con. Res. 37) providing for the printing of 50,000 additional copies of the report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry (H. Rept. No. 408, 67th Cong.), having had the same under consideration, report the resolution back with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

The resolution provides for the printing of the report in four parts. The committee proposes an amendment authorizing the printing of 50,000 copies of part 1 and part 2 of the report.

The Public Printer estimates the cost of printing of part 1 at $3,749.05, and the approximate cost of printing of part 2 at $2,400.

The resolution is as follows:

House concurrent resolution 37.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 50,000 additional copies of the report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, in four parts, of which 10,000 shall be for the Senate, 30,000 for the House, 1,000 shall be for the Senate document room, 2,000 for the House document room, and 7,000 for the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "of," insert "parts 1 and 2 of House Report No. 408, being."

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, the resolution provides for the printing of the report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry in four parts. Only two of these parts have been printed, and we are unable to get an estimate of what the other two parts will cost. The Committee on Printing does not feel like coming before the House and asking the House to authorize printing when it can give no estimate as to the cost. The cost of part 1 will be approximately $3,700, and of part 2, which contains 160 pages, approximately, $2,400. We believe that this report is of enough importance to warrant the expenditure of this amount of money. The resolution as amended by the committee authorizes only the printing of parts 1 and 2.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I notice in most of these resolutions that the proportion allowed to the 435 Members of the House is not what it ought to be, in my opinion, of the total print. You take this resolution, for instancee, and you allot to the 435 Members of the House 30,000 copies, and you retain for other people, including the Senate, very properly, twenty-odd thousand copies. That is not sufficient for 435 people in proportion to the number printed, especially when you allow 7,000 copies to some other particular body to send out. It is not treating the 435 Members right.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], who is chairman of this commission. Mr. ANDERSON is a Member of the House, and this is a House concurrent resolution, and it is to be supposed that a House Member would take care of the Members of the House.

I want to call attention to the fact that the Senate gets 10,000 copies and the House 30,000. Seven thousand copies go to this commission, whose members, of course, receive many requests for the same. I think they are entitled to a liberal number of these reports.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for two or three minutes?

Mr. KIESS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this resolution in its present form; but I want to make a suggestion which I hope will reach the Secretary of Agriculture. This resolution calls for a considerable amount of printing, to be paid for out of the House and Senate funds, which come from the taxpayers. The printing is necessary for the further study of the present situation of the farmers of the United States. The joint committee on farm problems, headed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], has done a big work. To promulgate its report in pamphlet form is necessary. But while I consider the printing of the report to be important and necessary, I beg to say that I do not consider all the printing put out by the Government either necessary or desired by the farmers. I refer to all Government printing, last administration and this administration. It has just "growed up."

Therefore, I take the liberty of suggesting that the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture can do no better service in the interest of economical printing than to recall from the Printing Office the manuscript of the Farmers' Almanac, which for the year 1922 has just gone to the Printing Office, in the guise of a farmers' bulletin, and is not yet in type and will not be printed and bound within 30 days, and which will be distributed by Congress and the slow processes of the Department of Agriculture when the year will be about one-fourth gone. The proposed edition of the Farmers' Almanac for 1922 is 175,000 copies, which, if it is of any good, would not be enough to supply the intelligent farmers of the State of Pennsylvania alone. It was prepared too late and I have done what I could to shut it off, but I am hampered and stopped for the reason that the Department of Agriculture and the supporters of all agricultural printing, regardless of the value of the same, dislike to throw up the sponge for the Farmers' Almanac because, before the Joint Committee on Printing knew about it, the Bureau of Mines has printed 15,000 almanacs for the miners for 1922 and the Public Health Service had put out a limited almanac edition for 1922.

Now, if the Miner's Almanac is any good at all, I could use 5,000 copies in my district, which would leave only 10,000 for Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Colorado, and other mining States.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I could use 20,000 copies in my district if they are worth anything.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of course, the gentleman could very well use 20,000 copies for his district. I think they are worth something, but I contend that both farmers and miners will agree that the Government ought not to be in the almanac business, particularly when the almanacs call attention to the birthdays of Secretaries and also call attention to the important fact that the agricultural experiment station at Sitka, Alaska, was established on August 12, 1898. Who cares? Last year's Farmers' Almanac tells us, for instance, that August is a good month for picnics, or, I quote, "Just to go fishing." It says:

> And from the hot field's farthest edge
> The cricket's soft refrain
> With mellow accent tells the tale
> That August's here again.

Just so, just so, and when August is here again we will know it and the farmers will know it without 175,000 Farmers' Almanacs, masquerading as Farmers' Bulletin No. 1202, to tell us so.

The Joint Committee on Printing has resolved against the further printing of almanacs, but shall we see them come forth next year labeled "Compendiums of Information," or something like that? The Secretary of Agriculture is calling loudly for the reestablishment of certain agricultural periodicals—not all. He knows there has been waste. Let him please the farmers, millions of whom will never see the almanac for 1922, by recalling the copy. It will be cheaper to lose the labor of the editor than to go ahead with the printing of $5,000 or $6,000 worth.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Can we not get Hostetter's Almanac any more?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not if the Government continues to compete with its four or five kinds of almanacs.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I was wondering whether it was out of public use.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is still a demand for the bitters. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, last year's Farmers' Almanac itself says:

> Many almanacs have been published by vendors of patent medicines, and even these have at least partially merited the sentence of "most despised, most prolific, and most indispensable of books."

If indispensable, why does not the Department of Agriculture print a few million? Why? Perhaps, for two reasons—the farmers would see the waste and the foolishness, and the Government Printing Office is pretty busy these days running off a small edition of 13,000,000 blanks for the collection of income taxes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is to be a national conference of farmers held on the 26th day of this month in Washington, in which the commission now investigating agriculture is to assist. Are the proceedings of that conference to be published also?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; except, perhaps, the date of it will be printed along about 1930. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up any more time, and I support the resolution of the committee. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for one question?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I did not understand what the cost of this publication would be.

Mr. KIESS. The cost will be approximately $5,100 for 50,000 copies of part 1 and 50,000 copies of part 2.

Mr. SNELL. Is it absolutely necessary to have this number of copies of this report printed?

Mr. KIESS. I want to say that this resolution was introduced on December 10, and that the members of this commission are very anxious to have it passed. The Committee on Printing did not take action until they had made a very thorough investigation, and, as I have said before, they refused to authorize the printing of parts 3 and 4 until we know more about them. We are satisfied that parts 1 and 2 are important enough to print, and that there should be 50,000 additional copies printed.

Mr. SNELL. I have no doubt that it is an important document, but it seems to me it is not necessary to print as many copies at this time.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. I will.

Mr. BLACK. When the gentleman speaks of parts 1 and 2, does he mean the testimony contained in parts 1 and 2? It is not the report of the committee, is it?

Mr. KIESS. It is the report of the commission.

Mr. BLACK. I was under the impression, from the number of pages spoken of, that it would be the testimony.

Mr. KIESS. No; this is the report and not testimony.

Mr. BLACK. I am glad to hear the gentleman state that, because I remember several years ago when the Industrial Relations Commission made its report the House printed all of the testimony at a cost of $85,000 or $90,000. I think the printing of the testimony at that time, in 8 or 10 books, was entirely unnecessary and was an expense which could have been avoided. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that this printing now called for is confined to the report of the committee.

Mr. KIESS. This is only the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the concurrent resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the passage of the concurrent resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC RECEPTION AT THE WHITE HOUSE.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the account in to-day's Washington Herald of the first diplomatic reception held in the White House since before the war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an account printed in to-day's Washington Herald of the diplomatic reception. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington objects.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute on a matter of program of procedure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the House concludes the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill to-day, I shall ask unanimous consent that when we adjourn we adjourn to meet on Monday.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. SLEMP, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, with Mr. SANDERS of Indiana in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. There remains one minute on each side for general debate.

Mr. SLEMP. I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. SISSON. I join in that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Mississippi each yield back one minute. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on this paragraph, and would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. This paragraph and the following paragraph, down to page 8, relate to the compensation and salaries of officials and clerks in the Post Office Department in Washington. Although the report on this bill states that there is no change of law, my contention is that this is a change of law. I do not think there can be any question about it after I have pointed out the existing statute.

The first paragraph of this bill reads as follows:

That the following sums are appropriated in conformity with the act of July 2, 1836, for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, namely.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not hear the gentleman distinctly.

Mr. STEENERSON. The first paragraph specifies that these appropriations are pursuant to the act of July 2, 1836. The act of July 2, 1836, is an act that provided for the reorganization of the Post Office Department and established the Fifth Auditor of the Post Office Department, under which all the appropriation bills for the Postal Service have been enacted for 86 years. I will read a part of the provision:

The revenue derived from the Post Office Department and all debts due the same shall, when collected, be paid by the Postmaster General to the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Postmaster General shall submit to Congress at the next and each succeeding annual session specific estimates of the sums of money expected to be required for the service of the department in the subsequent year, commencing on the 1st of July, under the following heads: Compensation of postmasters, transportation of the mails, ship and steamboat and way letters, wrapping paper, office furniture—

And so forth, giving a long list.

It further provides that the Postmaster General shall render an account to Congress at each successive annual session of the amount actually expended for such purpose above specified:

Be it further enacted, That the aggregate sum required for the service of the Post Office Department—

And that is printed in quotation marks—

in each year shall be appropriated by law out of the revenue of the department, and all payments and receipts of the Post Office Department in the Treasury shall be to the credit of said appropriation.

Now, when these estimates for the Post Office Department were sent to Congress they appeared in the Book of Estimates. I examined them and they were in accordance with the law, which requires the estimates on these subjects. That is all that the law authorizes to be put into the estimates, and the estimates were in accordance with that.

But yesterday when I found this bill I looked at the hearings, and I found for the first time that they have included $5,000,000 for expenses of the Post Office Department, not for the service of the Post Office Department, which they are authorized to estimate for and which Congress is required to appropriate out of the postal receipts and not out of the Treasury, and they are limited by the act of 1836 to appropriate for the service of the Post Office Department. That has been the practice for 86 years without any exception. The estimates are to be limited to the service and appropriations must be made out of the postal receipts.

Now, here is a bill that appropriates, in this paragraph and the following paragraphs down to page 12, for each division of the Post Office Department in Washington; first is the Postmaster General, which we have read, and then the First Assistant and Second Assistant, Third Assistant, and Fourth Assistant. These items have for the last 86 years always been carried in the legislative appropriation bill and never in the Post Office appropriation bill until this bill appears here. I have examined the budget law, and there is nothing in that law that authorizes the making of the change in the existing law. There is no repeal of the existing law and no implications can be drawn from that law that repeals the law of 1836. Evidently the department never knew that this could be done until after they sent in the estimates and appeared before the Appropriations subcommittee. Then for the first time they sought to have this appropriation bill cover the department expenses in Washington and the committee has appropriated for it.

Now, this is certainly legislation upon an appropriation bill, because the existing law says that the estimates shall be limited to that and the appropriation shall be limited to that, and it shall be taken out of the postal receipts. Here they appropriate $5,000,000 out of the receipts that are not authorized by any existing law. Now, it has been said that it does not make any difference, that if there is a deficit in the postal receipts it will be made up by taking it out of the Treasury. Very well. If they want to change the law, why not do it? But why not be content with existing law? It seems to me that this may have a very far-reaching effect. It is well known that the compensation of employees in the Post Office Department are regulated by different laws. They are included within those provided for by the reclassification act recently passed by the House and now pending in the Senate. No one can tell what the department will rule as to this appropriation out of the receipts for the service, whether it will have the same effect as those appropriated out of the Treasury. The committee does not know anything about it. They do not know what the consequence of the invasion might be; there might be indirect increases and probably would be. However that may be, the plain proposition is that this statute limits the appropriation out of the postal receipts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether he has noticed that in volume 17 of the Statutes at Large, section 227, the act to which he has referred and which is enumerated in the first paragraph of this bill, is repealed? The Chair would like to have the gentleman's opinion upon that.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not see that they ever repealed this section of the act of 1836. I am unable to locate that. Is it a specific clause, or is it an annotation? I do not think it changes the law in this regard, the language here says that money required for the Post Office Department each year shall be appropriated for by law out of the revenues of the department, and that all payments of the receipts of the Post Office Department shall be turned into the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. But the language does expressly repeal that portion of the act.

Mr. STEENERSON. How much of the act is repealed?

The CHAIRMAN. The section to which the gentleman referred is repealed.

Mr. STEENERSON. But it is recited here in another form. It is reenacted, and the new version also requires the appropriation for the service shall be out of postal receipts.

The CHAIRMAN. Another provision was reenacted, but not that provision. The present provision reads:

The money required for the Postal Service in each year shall be appropriated by law out of the revenues of the service.

Mr. STEENERSON. That does not change the law. That is just the same as the act of 1836, referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the point of order is that it is not in order on account of the act of 1872?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is more accurate. This does not change my point. This is a reenactment of the same thing. In other words, the appropriation for the Postal Service, not the expenses of the Post Office Department, but for the Postal Service, shall be appropriated for, and so forth. That term is well understood and has been for nearly 100 years. It means the field service, and this provides that that shall be appropriated for out of the revenues of the department. This does not change the former law at all. It is true, perhaps, that I should have referred to this. The law that requires the appropriations to be made out of the Postal Service is still in force. I was not aware that these changes in this later act had been made, but it does not change the point of order that I have made in the slightest. The appropriations must still be made out of the receipts of the Postal Service, so far as the Postal Service is concerned, and the Postal Service does not include the departmental service. This is the service of the Post Office Department. The very language of the bill is that it is for the service of the Post Office Department, so that this clause, it seems to me, is plainly a violation of existing law, and therefore is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, Rule XI of the House rules provides:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, viz, subjects relating to—

3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Appropriations for the Post Office Department, usually carried in the Post Office appropriation bill, have been made in conformity with the act of 1836. This practice and the use of the quoted language in the enacting clause of the Post Office appropriation bill have been in the various Post Office bills as far back as 1870, and probably before that, although the act of July 2, 1836, was repealed specifically by the act of June 8, 1872, Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 327.

Section 46 of the act of June 2, 1872, provides that the money required for the Postal Service in each year shall be appropriated by law out of revenues of the service.

Section 4054 of the Revised Statutes of 1878 of the United States provides that the money required for the Postal Service in each year shall be appropriated by law out of the revenues of the service.

Since the passage of the act of 1836 appropriations for the Post Office Department at Washington have been carried separately. The committee is willing to admit that. There is no law specifically defining the term "Postal Service" as distinguished from the Post Office Department. How could we have a Postal Service without somebody to manage it? The fair presumption must be that the department manages the service. If we take the department away from the service, who is going to manage the service? The terms "department" and "service" have been used interchangeably always. It might be just as well said that a bill of exchange or a draft or an acceptance are three different propositions, when, as a matter of fact, everyone knows that each one of these titles refers to the same thing, just as the Post Office Department refers to the Post Office Service and as the Post Office Service refers to the Post Office Department. It would be absurd to think otherwise. What good would the department be if it had no service to manage?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Not just now. What good would the service be if there was no department to manage it, and so here we have a great service, with headquarters here in Washington, with a manager of the service in charge of the department in Washington. It can not be said that the managers in Washington have nothing to do with the service, or that the duties of the managers are separate and apart from the service. We have a chief inspector with headquarters in Washington. What are the duties of the chief inspector? His duties are to direct the inspection of the service.

We have a Postmaster General. What are his duties? His duties are to direct the management of all the service. We have a First Assistant Postmaster General with headquarters in Washington, and what are his duties? His duties are to direct a given function of the Postal Service. Can it be said that because he happens to be here in Washington he is in no wise connected with the Postal Service and that his functions are entirely ornamental, as they would be if he had no connection with the service? What do we need of a Postmaster General if his function is purely ornamental? What do we need of the First Assistant Postmaster General if he has no duty to perform in the field? Is there any business in the world that would take away the managing officer from the service and expect the service to be continued and succeed?

The payment of appropriations for the Post Office Department in Washington from "moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" is a matter of custom, not of law. There is no law specifically stating that the expenses of the Post Office Department in Washington shall be paid from "money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." Section 4054 of the Revised Statutes of 1878 provides that money for the Postal Service shall be appropriated out of the revenues of the service. Further, there is no law defining what constitutes the Postal Service as distinguished from the Post Office Department, and surely it would be in order for the committee to provide for the payment of the expenses of the Post Office Department from the postal revenues, especially so since the jurisdiction of the committee is to appropriate revenue for the support of the Government, not for the support of any fraction of the Government.

No law existing defining what revenue the Post Office Department in Washington shall be paid from, it would be proper for the committee to designate the particular revenue which should be used for that purpose. That should be so particularly in this case, as we propose that the revenue of a particular department shall be devoted to the payment of the expenses of that department. Could there be anything more absurd than to assume that the revenue of the department, which includes the service, should not be used to pay the expenses of the department? The absurdity that has existed for years, namely, that the managing end of the Post Office Service has been paid by the Treasury Department, ought not any longer to continue to be tolerated. The Appropriations Committee, in following the alternative budget, formulated the subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee to provide that the entire expenses of a given department should be appropriated for in a single bill and thereby show on the face of the bill what the cost of the department is.

Is there any reason that a great business enterprise like the Post Office Department should have $4,000,000 of its expenses paid every year and charged to the Treasury Department? Why, there is no sense in it; no justice in it; no business in it. It complicates and mystifies where we are endeavoring to simplify and to clarify. All we are doing here is to exercise the authority which the rules of the House vest in the Committee on Appropriations. If the contention of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] should prevail, you can segregate every department and transfer the cost of its management to any other department. You could divide it up into any number of sections, if you please. But what are we trying to do? We are trying to put the Government finances on a simplified basis, so that not only the Members of the House and the Senate but the people of the United States may know what the cost of each activity is.

Talk about the necessity for continuing the absurd proposal of charging $4,000,000 a year for Post Office activities to the Treasury Department; why, any schoolboy that this question might be referred to would decide against that. Appropriations for the Post Office Department proper up to 1832 will be found in bills making appropriations for the support of the Government. From 1833 in the civil and diplomatic bill; from 1857 in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

In 1799 appropriations for the department were paid out of the fund of $600,000 reserved by the act making provision for the debt of the United States, together with so much as might be necessary from the proceeds of the duties on imports and tonnage on ships and vessels and duties on domestic and distilled spirits. So you see there was a time when they even took the revenues to pay the cost of the Post Office Department and all its activities from various other sources. From the year 1800 they were paid out of the $600,000 appropriation and also out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. In 1801 they were paid out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. From 1836 the appropriations for the department proper were made by the civil and diplomatic bill out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated. Prior to 1836 the power of the Postmaster General over his expenditures were practically unchecked and unlimited. July 2, 1836, Fifth Statutes at Large directed the aggregate sum required for the service of the Post Office Department in each year should be appropriated out of the revenue of the department. Sections 43 and 44 provide annual salaries for three Assistant Postmasters General, auditors, clerks, messengers, watchmen, and they appropriated the sum of $3,150,000 to conduct the Post Office Department, including all of its activities. Then, from 1837 to 1842, inclusive, the civil and diplomatic act made the appropriations for the Post Office Department proper out of unexpended moneys and appropriations for the Postal Service combined, in conformity with the act of July, 1836.

The present fiscal year was established on and after July, 1843, by act of August 26, 1842. The appropriation for the department proper in the six months ended July 30, 1843, will be found in Fifth Statutes at Large. It will be noted that the first appropriation for the Postal Service was for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1836; and so on, down the list.

And I contend that, inasmuch as all the appropriation work has been placed in the hands of the Appropriations Committee of the House, and that it has jurisdiction under the rules of the House to recommend appropriations for the conduct of the Government, the committee had a perfect right to provide the appropriation in the manner and form set out in the bill that is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. YATES. How long have they been charging this off to the Treasury, or is it simply a new proposal?

Mr. MADDEN. That has been going on as I have stated, and we are taking it away from the Treasury and putting it where it belongs.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly, and I am not sure that I do, the point of order is that appropriations for the postal field service must be made out of the revenues of the Post Office Department, and the appropriation for the general offices in Washington must be made out of other funds in the Treasury. May I ask my friend if that is correct?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is the provision of the section.

Mr. MANN. I want to know what the point of order is.

Mr. STEENERSON. That the appropriation as proposed in this bill for the postal department is a change of law.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in this bill that appropriates the expenses of the general office out of the receipts of the Post Office Department.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. Where?

Mr. STEENERSON. It appropriates it out of the receipts.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in this bill that says the expenses of the Post Office Department shall be paid out of the receipts of the post office. If the gentleman's contention is correct, that under the law of 1836 the field service must be paid out of the receipts of the Post Office Department, and the department expenses here must be paid out of the Treasury, the bill absolutely follows that line, because it says that the "following sums are appropriated in conformity with the act of July 2, 1836."

If that act provides that the expenses of the field service shall be paid out of the receipts and that the expenses of the department shall be paid out of the Treasury, that will follow as the consequence of this language. What point of order is there? The gentleman has not made a point of order that you could not consolidate in one bill the appropriations for what he calls two different services, and if that point of order were made, it would not lie; and so far, if the gentleman is correct—and I do not say that he is—but if the gentleman is correct as to his interpretation of the act of 1836, then it is up to the Treasury Department in paying these appropriations to pay the field service out of the receipts of the Postal Service and to pay the departmental expenses out of the Treasury. That does not affect the point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I first want to call attention to the fact that the alleged repeal of this act of 1836 is based on the note in the statute which says the act of May 9, 1836, is repealed in part:

So much of section 1 as relates to the duties of the Postmaster General.

Now, section 3 does not relate to the Postmaster General. It simply relates to Congress, because Congress is the body that makes the appropriation. It provides that the aggregate sum required for the service of the Post Office Department each year shall be appropriated by law out of the revenues of the department, and that all payments from the receipts of the Post Office Department in the Treasury shall be to the credit of such appropriations. That does not say anything about the Postmaster General, so that if the contention is made that this has been repealed, it does not repeal that section. It may repeal some other section of the law. That section stands unrepealed, and it absolutely requires appropriations to be made out of the revenues.

Now, my ingenious friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has pointed out that this bill might be construed so as to require the payment of departmental expenses in Washington out of the Treasury. But if that is so, the gentleman differs from the other distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and differs from the officials who testified, and from the report. The report they made on this bill was to the effect that they had eliminated that provision about payment from the Treasury, and had made it payable altogether out of the revenues.

The whole argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was that this is a reform, very beneficial, admitting thereby that it is a change of law, which is desirable. But we are not here to discuss the desirability of a change of law. The recommendation for the change of laws in the Postal Service should come from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and this Committee on Appropriations should not desire or attempt to aggrandize the power to make laws, however beneficial they may be. There is a manifest danger in every bill that comes from that committee that they are going to assume legislative as well as appropriating functions. It is time to stop it. It is to the interest of this House and of every Member of this House that we make the point, and here we take them at their own word. Their report on this bill and their hearings say that this bill is so written as to take money appropriated for the Post Office Department out of the receipts or revenues of the Postal Service.

Taking up the point which the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, made in regard to the construction of the words "Postal Service," it seems to me that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole should not embark upon an interpretation that is contrary to all precedents here for 86 years. The Postal Service is the service that brings in the revenue. The Post Office Department does not bring in any revenue. We appropriate that revenue. The fact that they put these words in the original act, the one that created the organization of the Post Office Department and created the Auditor for the Post Office Department, referring to this service in quotation marks in the statute, "That the aggregate sum required for the service of the Post Office Department," shows that it was something that had a well-understood and established meaning, a technical meaning, recognized for nearly 100 years.

Now the gentleman wants the Chair to wipe out that distinction, which has been followed not only in legislative but in judicial proceedings all these years. Everybody has understood that the appropriations and receipts of the Postal Service had a distinct meaning.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not the contention of my distinguished friend from Minnesota that the appropriations carried in this bill are in conflict with the act of 1836?

Mr. STEENERSON. So far as it appropriates for the Post Office Department out of the revenues, yes.

Mr. MANN. But the bill says that the appropriations are made in conformity with that act.

Mr. STEENERSON. I know; but that is false.

Mr. MANN. That is the law, if it is written into the law. If this is enacted, it is the law, and any contention that it is in conflict falls, because the law says it is in conformity with the act of 1836.

Mr. STEENERSON. It is evident when they wrote that law that they had in mind the fact that the act of 1836 was repealed.

Mr. MANN. No. I assume that they did not assume that they were saying that the appropriation should be made in conformity with a repealed act. However, I do not think that makes any difference. But this will be the law if it is enacted, and this law will say, if it is enacted, that the appropriations in this bill are in conformity with the act of 1836, notwithstanding my genial friend from Minnesota insists that they are in conflict with the act of 1836.

Mr. STEENERSON. So does the chairman of the committee contend.

Mr. MANN. But that is the opinion of the gentleman. The law says it must be in conformity with the act of 1836.

Mr. STEENERSON. Here is the report on this bill. It says:

The appropriations for the Post Office Department——

Mr. MANN. I look at the law, not at what somebody says.

Mr. STEENERSON. I read:

The appropriations for the Post Office Department customarily carried in the legislative, etc., act and the item for printing and binding customarily carried in the sundry civil act have heretofore been paid from the General Treasury, while the appropriations customarily carried in the Post Office bill have been payable from the postal revenues. In consolidating all the appropriations for the department in one bill the committee has recommended that all the expenses of the department be paid from the postal revenues to the extent that they are sufficient therefor and has carried the paragraph heretofore carried each year for many years appropriating from the General Treasury such sum as may be necessary to meet the deficit in the revenues.

In making provision for the Post Office Department in this bill the committee has used the phrascology of the various appropriating paragraphs in which appropriations for the items have heretofore been made. Most of these paragraphs are the result of years of development in accordance with legislative and departmental practice and decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury, and it was deemed unwise at this time to attempt a general rephrasing or rearrangement of them.

The contention now is that the Committee on Appropriations, with the witnesses from the department before them, did not know what they were talking about. This bill is framed, as shown by the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], for the express purpose of taking the money for the departmental expenses out of the revenues, and I think that the whole act must be construed together, and if so construed it will necessarily be held that that innovation which the committee recommends and asks the House to approve will follow.

Mr. OGDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. OGDEN. The language under which this item has been carried for the expenses of the department, as I understand, is this:

Out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation of the services—

And so on. That is the language under which this item has been carried throughout these many years, is it not?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not know from what the gentleman is reading.

Mr. OGDEN. If he will get the language of the current bill making the appropriations for the department——

Mr. STEENERSON. Here is the language from the last year's bill which the same committee reported:

That the following sums are appropriated in conformity with the act of July 2, 1836, for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922.

That differs slightly from the language of the pending bill.

Mr. OGDEN. Without the use of the language which I have read, how would the appropriation for the department be made available for the expenses of the department? Would it not come under the act of 1836?

Mr. STEENERSON. Under the act of 1836 the appropriations are required to be made out of the Treasury.

Mr. OGDEN. But I say, without the language the gentleman has just read, which is in the current bill, would the appropriation for the departmental expenses come under the terms of the act of 1836 or not?

Mr. STEENERSON. I must confess that I do not exactly catch the gentleman's idea in asking the question. The fact is that all the bills heretofore have contemplated an appropriation out of the postal revenues, and the department is not referred to. The department is provided for in another bill. This is the first time that the departmental expenses have ever been brought in here as a part of the Post Office appropriation bill. This is not, strictly speaking, the Post Office appropriation bill at all.

Mr. OGDEN. If you omit that provision which appropriates under this language current language, the appropriation being made out of the Treasury for departmental expenses, then you will get the appropriation not only for your field service, but for your departmental service under the act of 1836—that is, "the following sums are appropriated in conformity with the act of July 2, 1836, for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923."

Mr. STEENERSON. So far as that applies to the Postal Service—that is, the field service—it is taken out; but there is nothing——

Mr. OGDEN. Just another question. Has not that language been subject to a point of order in all those bills? Was it not legislation?

Mr. STEENERSON. This legislation never has been carried in the Post Office appropriation bill before in all the history of the United States. This is the first time it has appeared.

Mr. OGDEN. I understand——

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman's committee has brought this in for the first time, and the only place where you can find provision for the payment of the expenses of the Post Office Department is in the legislative act for each year. But the bill must be construed together. All its provisions must be construed together, notwithstanding the fine point that was made here that this would authorize the department to pay the departmental expenses out of any money in the Treasury. That can not be so, because this first clause says in compliance with the act of 1836, and that says that all appropriations must be paid out of the revenues. Now, if you are going to comply with that, you are going to pay departmental expenses. Certainly the gentleman's question does not throw any light on it. Here is a clause that begins by saying that they appropriate the following sums in compliance with the act of 1836. Then follows an item that is outside of the act of 1836. If that appropriation stands, the Comptroller of the Treasury would be bound to pay it as provided for here, or else he could not pay it at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not the department the business end of the entire Postal Service?

Mr. STEENERSON. No doubt it is the center from which the business is managed.

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any part of the Postal Service that is not connected with the department itself?

Mr. STEENERSON. The department is the managing end; but the gentleman overlooks the fact that the department itself can get no revenue. It does not earn anything.

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any portion of the business of the Post Office Department that is not of itself a part of the Post Office Service?

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman seek to argue that the interpretation of the words "service of the Post Office Department" has been wrong for these 86 years, and that therefore they should have construed it to mean the service of the Post Office Department?

Mr. BLANTON. They are so intimately connected that they are a part of it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Then the interpretation of the comptroller and of the courts and of the Congress has been wrong, and that discovery has just been made to-day. Now the officials of the Post Office Department have no revenue. Their revenue must come from appropriations out of the Treasury. That has been the rule, as I have said, for nearly a hundred years. Now, if you are going to change it, and if it is wise to change it, you should not do it by this indirect and concealed method. I venture to say there was nobody on the floor here who really noticed that this was a revolutionary proposition, that it is broader than appears on its face, because the bill says as usual that it is appropriated under the act of 1836, but the act of 1836 covers only appropriations out of the revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order that in paragraph 2 of the bill there are items of appropriation which do not come within the usual term of "field service," that it is an appropriation in violation of the provisions of the act of July 2, 1836. The act of July 2, 1836, reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the aggregate sum required for the service of the Post Office Department in each year shall be appropriated by law out of the revenues of the department, and all payments and receipts of the Post Office Department in the Treasury shall be to the credit of said appropriation.

That provision is expressly repealed by the act of June 8, 1872, not by implication but by expressly referring to it in the repealing clause. The provision of law (act of June 8, 1872) which supplants the repealed section reads as follows:

The money required for the Postal Service in each year shall be appropriated for out of the revenues of the service.

The scope of the term "Postal Service" presents a very interesting question. The Appropriation Committee has plenary appropriating power. It might be the committee would have the right to make this appropriation irrespective of the construction contended for by the gentleman from Minnesota. It seems to the Chair, however, that the point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes it unnecessary for the Chair to decide whether the Appropriations Committee under the present rule has the power to report items of appropriation for expenditures in the department out of the revenues of the department. In ruling on the point of order, the Chair must be governed by the language of the bill. The language of the bill expressly provides that the sums are appropriated in conformity with the act of July 2, 1836. The fact that that act has been repealed does not militate against reference to it in the present bill. An act which has been repealed may be referred to in a measure in order to make it definite. In other words, by the terms of the bill these appropriations covered by all the items in section 1 are in conformity with the provisions of the act which the gentleman from Minnesota says they violate.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the Chair allow me to make a statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The legislation repealing the act or part of the act enacted a new provision which says that that appropriation shall be paid out of the revenues of the service. There is no difference between the reenacting section and the old section.

The CHAIRMAN. There is some difference in language, but in the opinion of the Chair that is immaterial. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order that the committee violates the provisions of the act of July 2, 1836, when by the very terms of the bill it appropriates in conformity with that act. To be sure, there are some things in the report and in the statements by gentlemen on the floor that indicate a contrary view of the effect of the bill. But the Chair is bound by the terms of the bill and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, after the word "and" where it last appears in the line insert the word "seventy."

Mr. SLEMP. In explanation of that amendment I will say to the committee that the language was written "one hundred and seventy-two," but in some way in printing the word "seventy" was left out. This is to restore the proper number.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, a question. I notice on page 2, line 7, the statutory salary of the appointment clerk is $2,000. Does the gentleman know what amount he is paid in addition to his statutory salary?

Mr. SLEMP. This is the statutory amount as given to us by the Post Office Department. I believe in view of the work being done in connection with war-savings stamps he may have additional compensation.

Mr. ROUSE. What authority has the department to pay him additional compensation?

Mr. SLEMP. That is a matter between him and the Treasury Department. These appropriations carry only this particular salary.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any evidence that he is being paid an extra salary? I have seen an explanation made——

Mr. SLEMP. I have no evidence of it myself, and we are not carrying in the appropriation act any extra sum.

Mr. ROUSE. I have evidence in a letter from the Postmaster General. The question is this: On page 28 of the hearings the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] asked this question of the appointment clerk:

> I want the title and the assignment and the duties of all the employees in the Post Office Department—that is, the department here in Washington—who receive a salary of $2,000 or more per annum, including the bonus, and the appropriations from which paid.
> Mr. REGER. I will insert the information in the record, as you suggest.

I notice he refers to the duties which he performs, but does not state the salary that he is receiving. The fact is that he is receiving $3,200 a year, so stated by the Postmaster General, and with the permission of the committee I shall insert in the RECORD a copy of a letter I addressed to the Postmaster General and his reply giving the salaries of the several different officials and the duties to which they are assigned.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does this official state that he has other duties to perform besides the one referred to in the bill?

Mr. ROUSE. I think the Postmaster General states that he does.

Mr. SLEMP. He is assigned to the war savings stamps work.

Mr. DOWELL. Then, of course, the salary, if there is additional salary, is for work done in addition to the work of the appointment clerk.

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If I may be allowed, I would like to make this statement: I do not know anything about what salary this man gets outside of the statutory salary provided for, if he gets any.

Mr. ROUSE. He gets $1,200 in addition to this.

Mr. MADDEN. The Postmaster General has at his disposal $55,000 with which to pay the force charged with the responsibility of paying off the war savings stamps and certificates that fall due from time to time. To whom these duties are assigned or how they are divided I do not know. He has authority out of that lump sum to pay for the service rendered in his office in connection with the work of the cancellation and the payment of the war savings stamps and certificates as they fall due.

These stamps are presented to the postmasters of the United States for payment. After payment the canceled stamps are sent to the Post Office Department for audit. The Post Office Department, through its force paid from the $55,000 allotment from the Treasury Department, audits and then transfers the stamps, after they are audited, checked, and accounted for, to the Treasury Department itself, where a further audit is made. To whom they pay the money out of the $55,000 I do not know, but as far as this committee is concerned we carry nothing except what the law provides.

Mr. ROUSE. I do not think this official performs any duties at all connected with the war-savings stamps. I shall ask further consent to insert in the RECORD the duties of the appointment clerk as he outlines them in the report of the hearings, on page 30.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROUSE. I want now to ask the chairman of the committee about the salary of the assistant to the chief clerk, which is carried in this bill at $2,000.

Mr. SLEMP. I have no information that he gets any more than the statutory amount provided for.

Mr. ROUSE. The Postmaster General reports that he is receiving $3,000. I take it that that is a violation of the civil-service order, and I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a copy of that order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does the Postmaster General explain why these payments are made?

Mr. ROUSE. He does. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a copy of my letter to the Postmaster General and his reply.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the complaint that the gentleman makes I would say that I personally investigated the matter more or less and I found out what I have already said about the $55,000. In the bill making appropriations for the Treasury Department, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will remember, $100,000 is provided by the Treasury Department to be set apart for the Post Office Department, to be used for the continuation of this work about which I have just talked.

We placed a limitation upon that appropriation in the Treasury Department bill to the effect that no person employed and paid out of that appropriation shall receive a greater sum than $1,800 per annum.

Mr. ROUSE. This man could not perform the duties of appointment clerk and at the same time perform the duties connected with the war savings stamps.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROUSE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know how long this clerk has been detailed to this extra work?

Mr. ROUSE. I think he was detailed to it in the last administration, about July 1, 1920.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that he was.

Mr. ROUSE. The letter of the Postmaster General explains that.

Mr. MANN. It is not a political matter now.

Mr. ROUSE. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. If there is any criticism to be made of it, that criticism should be made of the former Postmaster General, Mr. Burleson.

Mr. ROUSE. If the last administration permitted that to be done, that is no reason why it should be continued by the present administration.

Mr. MANN. I suppose it is proper for the gentleman to call attention to it now.

Mr. ROUSE. Yes; and I am glad to have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. MANN. Although he did not call attention to it in the last administration; but I presume there is good reason for it, or it would not have been done.

Mr. ROUSE. Absolutely. Under the permission granted to extend my remarks, I append hereto the correspondence between the Postmaster General and myself, the civil-service order to which I referred, and the duties of the appointment clerk as outlined by himself:

COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1922.

Hon. WILL H. HAYS,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. POSTMASTER GENERAL: Will you kindly inform me at the earliest possible moment the salary received by each official listed under the Post Office Department, beginning with page 275 of the Congressional Directory of December 21. What I desire to know is the amount of money actually paid to each of these officials for their services and from what appropriation it is paid. If they are being carried on the rolls at any other salary than the statutory salary prescribed by law for the position under which they are listed, kindly state who is receiving the statutory salary and the duties to which assigned. To illustrate: Is Robert S. Ragar, who is listed as appointment clerk, drawing the salary prescribed by law for that position? If not, what salary is he receiving and from what appropriation is it paid, and who is receiving the salary prescribed by law for the appointment clerk and to what duties is he assigned?

I wish this information in each case and will thank you to have it sent me, in order that I may make use of it to-morrow.

Very respectfully,
A. B. ROUSE.

Mr. Thomas J. Howell, superintendent Division of Rural Mails, at $3,000 per annum, is detailed to the position of Assistant Chief Clerk. His salary is paid out of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation. Mr. Howell was promoted and detailed, effective August 1, 1920, by the then Postmaster General, Mr. Burleson. Under the direction of the chief clerk, the assistant chief clerk has charge of the immediate supervision of the subclerical forces, including the engineers, electricians, firemen, dynamo tenders, oilers, watchmen, telephone operators, laborers, charwomen, etc.; telephone and telegraph offices, printing section, file room, stationery and supply room, a total of 300 employees; the care of the three departmental buildings, consisting of the main building, the new post-office building, and the mail equipment shops, also ascertaining the need of and supervising the repairs to such buildings. To keep these buildings in the proper condition and to meet the constantly changing requirements of the department it is a matter of necessity to make certain repairs and alterations from time to time, and the cautious and businesslike handling of this work enables the saving of thousands of dollars to the Government. The buildings are large ones, and in them are housed 4,000 employees for whose health and comfort it is necessary to give close attention to the questions of ventilation, sanitation, heating, and lighting. These details are assigned by the chief clerk to the immediate supervision of the assistant chief clerk. The assistant chief clerk also handles the details of the work of preparing estimates for the contingent expenses of the department and for printing and binding for the entire Postal Service, and the consideration of all requisitions involved in the expenditures of such appropriations.

It is proper to state here that all the correspondence prepared by the bureaus for the signature of the Postmaster General, much of which involves questions of policy affecting the Postal Service throughout the country, come through and is reviewed by the assistant chief clerk of the department. This includes much important work which must be personally looked after on behalf of the Postmaster General, and the chief clerk's office is a clearance office, so to speak, for the work of the entire department.

Attention is invited to the fact that the assistant chief clerk of the Post Office Department proper at Washington must have a very general and thorough knowledge of the entire postal establishment, and when need be acts as chief clerk in the absence of that officer, with whom, as indicated, he shares the work and responsibility.

The designation of assistant chief clerk is held by Mr. Wm. C. O'Brien, detailed to the office of the solicitor as assistant attorney. He is performing legal work in the office of the solicitor.

Mr. Robert S. Regar, personnel officer, at $3,200 per annum, is detailed from the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General to his present assignment and is paid out of the appropriation "Expenses of war savings and thrift stamps, Post Office Department." Mr. Regar was promoted and detailed on July 1, 1920, by the then Postmaster General, Mr. Burleson. His duties are as follows:

"'Follow-up man' on all important matters pending in the department. Has charge of work incident to the appointment, assignment to duty among the different offices, and separations from the service of all employees in the Post Office Department proper at Washington and certain positions of the Postal Service. The number of employees aggregate more than 3,000. This entails a large volume of work, consisting of the examination of papers in the case of eligibles certified by the Civil Service Commission to fill vacancies and deciding whether such eligibles have the necessary qualifications and conducting correspondence incident thereto."

He is charged with the preparation of monthly reports to the Civil Service Commission, giving in detail every change of status, as required by law, notices and oaths of changes to the employees affected, and reports to disbursing clerk for proper adjustment of salaries requiring a knowledge of precedents, postal laws and regulations, and comptroller opinions.

He also has charge of the granting of leave to employees, keeping record thereof, and the adjustment semimonthly of salaries of employees who have exceeded the leave allowed under the law and regulations, requiring a thorough knowledge of postal laws and regulations and opinions of the comptroller.

He is a member of the Postmaster General's staff.

The appointment clerk's office adjusts efficiency ratings upon which changes in status of employees are based. This work requires the greatest care and accuracy, and inasmuch as the turnover of the department is between 25 and 30 per cent a year a great amount of work is necessary. The efficiency ratings are always open to the employees for inspection so that the work has to be kept up to date and in such shape that the employees' status can be gone over in detail.

The checking and certifying to pay rolls is also charged to this office.

He has immediate charge of the discipline of employees of the department, which requires a thorough knowledge of the civil-service rules and regulations and the department's policies and procedure.

The appointment clerk is also required to carry out the provisions of the retirement act, requiring not only a knowledge of the act, but also has to keep in constant touch with decisions affecting the various provisions of the act.

Numerous other duties are performed by the appointment clerk requiring a knowledge of the department organization, precedents, laws, and regulations, and an enormous amount of correspondence incident thereto.

The designation of appointment clerk is held by Mr. Ebert K. Burlew, who is confidential secretary to the Postmaster General.

Mr. Direlle Chaney, assistant attorney at $2,500 per annum, is detailed as confidential clerk to the Postmaster General and is temporarily paid out of the legislative appropriation. Mr. Chaney is an attorney and handles important matters in connection with the departmental and field service for the Postmaster General. The position of confidential clerk to the Postmaster General at $2,000 remains unfilled at this time.

Mr. Kirk L. Russell, special agent, at $3,000 per annum, temporarily paid out of the appropriation for "Mail bags and equipment, office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General," is performing the duties of investigating suggestions made by employees of the Postal Service, boards of trade, and the general public looking to the interests of the public service.

The designation of chief, division of correspondence, is held by Mr. Charles E. Warren, who is receiving the salary of $2,000 paid out of the appropriation for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses. He has been an employee of the Post Office Department since October 1, 1906, and his duties consist of miscellaneous correspondence not assigned to other bureaus and offices of the department; also correspondence in connection with the stationery and other supplies used by the department proper.

Mr. George L. Wood, general superintendent, division of rural mails, at $3,000 per annum, is paid out of the appropriation for rural delivery service. He has entire supervision of the division of rural mails, including the personnel, in which division is handled the rural delivery, star route, screen-wagon services, and contract-vehicle service in cities. This includes the establishment and maintenance of rural delivery routes and the appointment, discipline, and discontinuance of rural delivery carriers under civil-service rules; the establishment and maintenance of star routes and screen-wagon routes and the furnishing of vehicles for city delivery service, including the awarding of contracts therefor and enforcement thereof; keeping contractors' accounts and reporting same to the proper officer for payment. Perhaps the greatest responsibility is in connection with the awarding of contracts, it being entirely a matter of judgment when service should be established or continued in operation and how high a rate of pay is justified, as there is no law or regulations governing on these points.

Mr. Wood meets and confers with callers, Congressmen and others, interested in the service; confers with and directs the clerks in charge of sections as to policies, passing personally upon the more important correspondence and cases and the awarding of contracts in the more complex cases.

The designation of superintendent, division of rural mails, as indicated above, is held by Mr. Thomas J. Howell, who is detailed to the position of assistant chief clerk.

In this connection attention is called to the fact that since the establishment of the Post Office Department it has been the practice to detail employees from one bureau to another in the interest of good administration and the service. A careful analysis of the foregoing will disclose that at the present time there are five details to the positions listed under "Post Office Department," beginning on page 275 of the Congressional Directory of December, 1921, as compared with a total of 74 details during the fiscal year 1914, which was the first fiscal year under the last administration.

The five details existing at the present time include two made by my predecessor, Hon. A. S. Burleson, namely, the details of Mr. T. J. Howell and Mr. R. S. Regar.

I assure you that these details are in the interest of the public service and were made solely with that idea in mind.

Very sincerely, yours,

WILL H. HAYS,
Postmaster General.

APPOINTMENT OR ASSIGNMENT OF EMPLOYEES TO DUTIES OUTSIDE THE SCOPE OF THEIR RESPECTIVE RATINGS.

The Civil Service Commission has requested that the following instructions be communicated to nominating and appointing officers of the executive civil service:

1. The appointment or assignment of competitive classified employees to duties outside the scope of their respective designations when justified by circumstances has not been regarded as contrary to the civil service act and rules unless administrative regulations adopted thereunder prohibit such action. The basis of this practice is that an officer is responsible for the work under his charge, and its prosecution may require assignment of employees to duties not within the scope of their designation. The propriety of these assignments has not been questioned so long as employees were not changed in designation or promoted to rates of pay above those appropriate for their designation.

NOTE.—Appointment or assignment of mere unskilled laborers to duties of the kind usually performed by classified employees is forbidden by the civil-service rules, with the sole exception that with the prior approval of the commission unclassified laborers may be assigned to classified work which is incidental to their regular work and which can not be economically and conveniently done by classified employees.

2. This practice was believed to be a sound administrative measure by permitting wide latitude to officers and obviating complaints by employees against assignments not agreeable to them. Recently there has been so much abuse of the privilege in some quarters as to bring the operation of the civil-service rules into disrepute. Pressure due to the war has probably caused action which would not have been taken under normal conditions.

3. It is impossible to describe all probable abuses which have taken place or may take place under the wide practice heretofore prevailing. Among those which may be mentioned are the appointment of persons as mere unskilled laborers and their assignment to classified duties; appointment to trades positions for which applicants are not plentiful and their assignment to clerical or other office duties; and appointment under inappropriate designation to permit payment of higher rates than would be paid should appropriate designations be used.

4. All nominating, appointing, or other personnel officers of this department will, within three months, return employees to the duties ordinarily performed by them under their respective designations; correct assignment by removal, if necessary, of persons appointed under one designation for the performance of work of an entirely different designation; or report for consideration to the department any such cases in which change would cause serious embarrassment. Failure to carry out these instructions will lead to disciplinary action in the case of officers responsible therefor.

5. Any employee who is assigned to work outside the scope of his official designation, or any employee who shall become cognizant of such assignment of another employee, must bring the fact in writing to the attention of the head of his bureau or office.

These instructions have been approved, and it is directed that copies be posted on all bulletin boards.

DUTIES OF APPOINTMENT CLERK.

Appointment clerk; salary, $2,000 plus $240 bonus: The appointment clerk, under the direction of the chief clerk, has charge of the work incident to the appointment, assignment to duty among the different offices, and separation from the service of all employees in the Post Office Department proper at Washington and certain positions of the Postal Service. The number of employees aggregate more than 3,000. This entails a large volume of work, consisting of the examination of papers in the case of eligibles certified by the Civil Service Commission to fill vacancies and deciding whether such eligibles have the necessary qualifications and conducting correspondence incident thereto.

He is charged with the preparation of monthly reports to the Civil Service Commission, giving in detail every change of status, as required by law, notices and oaths of changes to employees affected, and reports to disbursing clerk for proper adjustment of salaries requiring a knowledge of precedents, Postal Laws and Regulations, and comptroller opinions.

He also has charge of the granting of leave to employees, keeping record thereof, and the adjustment semimonthly of salaries of employees who have exceeded the leave allowed under the law and regulations, requiring a thorough knowledge of Postal Laws and Regulations and opinions of the comptroller.

The appointment clerk's office adjusts efficiency ratings upon which changes in status of employees are based. This work requires the greatest care and accuracy and, inasmuch as the turnover of the department is between 25 and 30 per cent a year a great amount of work is necessary. The efficiency ratings are always open to the employees for inspection so that the work has to be kept up to date and in such shape that the employees' status can be gone over in detail.

The checking and certifying to pay rolls is also charged to this office.

He has immediate charge of the discipline of employees of the department which requires a thorough knowledge of the civil-service rules and regulations and the department's policies and procedure.

The appointment clerk is also required to carry out the provisions of the retirement act, requiring not only a knowledge of the act, but also has to keep in constant touch with decisions affecting the various provisions of the act.

Numerous other duties are performed by the appointment clerk requiring a knowledge of the department organization, precedents, laws, and regulations and an enormous amount of correspondence incident thereto.

The Clerk read as follows:

In making readjustments under the foregoing paragraph the salary of any clerk in any class may be fixed by the Postmaster General at $100 below the salary fixed by law for such class and the unused portion of such salary shall be used to increase the salary of any clerk in any class entitled thereto by not less than $100 above the salary fixed by law for such class. The Postmaster General shall assign to the several bureaus, offices, and divisions of the Post Office Department in the District of Columbia such number of the employees authorized in the foregoing paragraph as may be necessary to perform the work required therein; and he shall submit a statement showing such assignments and the number employed at the various salaries in the budget following the estimates for salaries in the Post Office Department.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph for the reason that it is a change of existing law and is legislation on an appropriation bill. For instance, Mr. Chairman, take the 118 clerks provided for at $1,800 each. This paragraph would authorize the Postmaster General to reduce the salary of each one of 117 of those clerks by $100, and it would then authorize him to give the total sum of the reductions of the 117, or the sum of $11,700, to one particular man as an increase in salary, if he saw fit. It would thus permit the department to show favoritism in behalf of certain employees to the detriment of others. That is true with respect to the 102 employees and also in respect to the 278 employees; also with respect to the 356 employees and the 138 employees provided for on page 2 of the bill. He could cut the great majority of them down $100 each below the salary fixed by law and then give the total amount of reductions, without limitation at all, to some particular favorites as increases in their salaries. I submit that it should not be permitted in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. This language has always been carried in the act, and it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. But there is no substantive law authorizing it.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, if we are going to get back where we insist on language that is only carried on account of substantive law, probably most of the appropriations would be stricken out. But this is good practice; it is for orderly management. It has always been done and ought to continue to be done. I do not believe it is subject to a point of order. It is not legislation. It is simply a matter in the conduct of the office which should exist.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not wish to be technical, Mr. Chairman, and I do not wish to make an objection unless I have a good reason for it. If there were good reason for carrying this, it would be different; but I do not think it is a wise policy to permit some particular bureau chief, even in the Post Office Department, to decide that he will reduce the salary of a great number of employees by $100 below that which the law fixes, and then give it in increases to somebody else for whom he has a special liking.

Mr. SLEMP. This provision here has been requested by various Postmasters General in recent years and in the interest of efficiency in the service.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you think it is a wise policy?

Mr. SLEMP. I certainly do.

Mr. BLANTON. Then why not take away from Congress altogether the right to fix these salaries and place them in the hands of the Postmaster General entirely?

Mr. SLEMP. This slight variation here is all they ask, and they contend it is in the interest of efficiency.

Mr. BLANTON. It gives them authority to reduce the salary of hundreds of employees in the department to the extent of $100 each, and then to increase other salaries without limitation.

Mr. SLEMP. But his statement is that he does not reduce any clerks.

Mr. BLANTON. It does not say "not more" than $100 increase, but "not less" than $100 increase. There is therefore no limitation placed whatever upon the increase, except so far as the maximum of the total amount of reductions made on others. It should be "not more" instead of "not less."

Mr. SLEMP. I was just going to state how this operates. The gentlemen that came before the committee stated that they had not reduced any clerks, because under their efficiency system no clerks could be reduced. Here is a person who receives an $1,800 clerkship that leaves the service, and you take off that $1,800 and promote anybody along the line and make promotion to $1,700. That is the way it works out. They contend it is a very important matter.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. On line 2, page 4, is it intended the language should stand "by not less than $100," or is it intended to be "not more than $100"?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes; less than $100.

Mr. BLANTON. It thus leaves no limitation whatever on the increase. In other words, he could increase one man's salary $100,000. If they saved $100 each on a thousand clerks by so reducing them, he could.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I think I can explain the matter to the gentleman. On line 23, page 3, it says:

Salary of any clerk in any class may be fixed by the Postmaster General at $100 below the salary fixed by law for such class, and the unused portion of such salary shall be used to increase the salary of any clerk in any class entitled thereto by not less than $100 above the salary fixed by law for such class.

Note the words "by law." There is a statutory law fixing it in these various salaries and grades, and the Postmaster General could not advance any employee more than $100.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt in the world that the contention of the gentleman from Texas is correct in that there is no limit to which he might increase it in so far as this fund is concerned. That language, if it stays in the bill, ought to read "not more than $100." There is no question about that. If that language stays in the bill, although the Post Office Department may always interpret it to mean not more than $100, the way it is written now it says "not less than $100," and there is no maximum at all. Therefore we should have the word "more" instead of the word "less."

Mr. SLEMP. Does the gentleman contend that this is not legislation?

Mr. BLANTON. There is absolutely no substantive law for it. I think it is an unwise policy to give such power to anybody, because there is favoritism shown right now with respect to reducing assistant postmasters to the grade of clerks all over the country. I have several of them in my district that have been reduced from assistant postmasters to clerks, with a reduction in salary to $1,800, where they had been getting salaries of assistant postmasters heretofore.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield, if I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP] has the floor.

Mr. SLEMP. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. May I inquire, if the gentleman is correct and means what is actually being done in the department, and the salary is not increased to exceed $100, the gentleman would then withdraw his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I think that would materially help the situation. Suppose the gentleman had 20 of his constituents in this class of 118 clerks here drawing $1,800, and those 20 clerks were reduced $100 apiece and that $2,000 then given to another clerk adjoining his constituents as an increase of salary, would he be satisfied with that kind of a proposition?

Mr. DOWELL. If it was for the good of the service, and I assume that the language is here for that purpose. It seems to me there ought to be an adjustment here whereby the department could adjust these so that they could get the best service possible.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the contemplated resignation of the chief of this entire department now intended for the good of the service?

Mr. DOWELL. The question that I am asking is, If the gentleman could be assured there would be no increase of more than $100 to any clerk, it would relieve the objection he has?

Mr. BLANTON. It would help it out wonderfully.

Mr. SISSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if the committee would agree to change in line 5 the words "not less than" to the words "not more than" $100, if he would then agree to the amendment? I say that because I think by doing that it would give the Postmaster General simply the right to reduce the salary in the event the salary was thought by him to be too high, and would not give him the right to increase the salary.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman from Mississippi believe this to be a wise policy that gives the Postmaster General the right to reduce $100 below the amount fixed by law the compensation with respect to hundreds of clerks? Not with respect to just a few, but to hundreds of clerks?

Mr. SISSON. To be frank, if the Postmaster General is willing to assume that right in favor of the taxpayers, I would be glad to vest him with that power.

Mr. BLANTON. If it were done for that purpose, yes; but if it were done on the recommendation of certain bureau chiefs who are trying to show favoritism to a few as against the many, then what would the gentleman's action be?

Mr. SISSON. On the statement that the gentleman now makes I would say instantly no; but I would not want to assume that everybody connected with the department would do that. In other words, I would rather indulge the presumption which the law indulges in, that a man will do his duty. But if he would abuse this power by punishing people that he does not like, I think that such a Postmaster General would not last long.

Mr. BLANTON. He could do it time and time again without knowing it, on the recommendation of bureau chiefs. I have had complaints of favoritism being shown, not merely in this administration, but in the preceding administration. It is not a partisan matter.

Mr. SISSON. I really believe that if you would change the word from "less" to "more" it would not be subject to a point of order, but it would be in order under the Holman rule.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield for one other question?

Mr. BLANTON. I do.

Mr. DOWELL. Would the gentleman withhold his point of order if an amendment can be offered to this paragraph making the word "less" read "more"?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the gentleman is such a good parliamentarian that he knows if I did that the point of order would be waived.

Mr. DOWELL. I think not.

Mr. BLANTON. It would. If you were to permit the paragraph to be amended at all, then the point of order is waived.

Mr. DOWELL. But I am assuming that if it is amended the condition would be largely relieved and the gentleman would not want to press his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I think it is an unwise policy.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will not make the point of order. We will offer an amendment. I think it would be a wise policy to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. If both the majority and the minority side agree, and if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP] will assure us that that amendment will be placed there, so as to place a maximum of $100 on the increase, I will withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. The reservation of the point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, on page 4, line 2, to strike out the word "less" and insert "more," so that the language shall read "by not more than $100 above the salary fixed by law for such class."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SLEMP: Line 2, strike out the word "less" and insert in lieu thereof the word "more."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office, First Assistant Postmaster General: First Assistant Postmaster General, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,500; division of post-office service—superintendent $4,000, assistant superintendent $3,000, clerk in charge $2,250; division of postmasters' appointments—superintendent $3,000, two assistant superintendents at $2,000 each; superintendent, division of dead letters, $2,500; chief division of correspondence, $2,000; in all, $28,250.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he knows what salary the acting chief clerk to the First Assistant Postmaster General now receives?

Mr. SLEMP. All that I know is what he is authorized by law to receive.

Mr. ROUSE. Does the gentleman know whether an employee from the inspection service has been detailed to this department to do the work of the chief clerk at an increased salary over the statutory allowance for chief clerk?

Mr. SLEMP. I am sorry I have not the data.

Mr. ROUSE. I do not know it to be a fact, but I have been informed that an official from the inspection service is the acting chief clerk and receives a salary in excess of the statutory allowance for chief clerk.

Mr. SLEMP. We asked the Post Office Department to insert in the record a complete statement of all transfers connected with the Postal Service, with the duties they are performing and the salaries they are now receiving.

Mr. ROUSE. That has been done, but it is not complete. What I want to put into the RECORD is a copy of the law. I would like to read it to the gentleman, and especially call attention of the Solicitor of the Post Office Department and the Civil Service Commission. On page 34 of the Postal Regulations it is provided:

Hereafter it shall not be lawful to detail clerks or other employees paid from general appropriations for the Postal Service from any branch of said Postal Service, whether located at the seat of government or elsewhere, to any of the offices or bureaus of the Post Office Department at Washington.

That is from the law of 1898, March 15, chapter 68, Thirtieth Statutes, page 317.

Now, if I can have the attention of the chairman, I would like to ask him about one other official. This provision provides for the salary of the chief of the division of correspondence at $2,000. The Postmaster General states that this position is being held by Mr. K. L. Russell, and that he is being paid from the appropriation for the mail bag and equipment service. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that is a violation of the law?

Mr. SLEMP. We bring that out on page 55 of the hearings. We got that one. We were informed that Mr. Russell's assignment is merely temporary.

Mr. ROUSE. But he is paid $3,000, and he is not performing any duty connected with the mail bag and equipment service.

Mr. SLEMP. Can the gentleman state how long that has been going on?

Mr. ROUSE. I can not.

Mr. SLEMP. The provisions in this bill are exactly the same as have been carried for a number of years. This provision is exactly as it was last year.

Mr. ROUSE. The Postmaster General states in his letter that the five details existing at the present time include two made by his predecessor, and those two details are of Mr. Howell and Mr. Regar. The other three details have been made by the present administration.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation, to be fixed by the Postmaster General, of such number of employees as may be necessary to audit the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service, $592,790.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas reserves a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I should like to ask the Chairman why there is no limitation as to salaries in this paragraph?

Mr. SLEMP. This is under the Bureau of Accounts. They submitted to the committee an estimate for a rather large increase in salaries in that bureau, and also for the transfer of a lot of statutory salaries to the lump-sum roll. We went over the matter very thoroughly with Mr. Cram, the gentleman in charge of that, and the committee denied all salary increases of every kind, declined to make any transfers from statutory salaries to the lump-sum roll, but left the department in the same situation as we found it, without increasing the personnel or anything else.

Mr. BLANTON. We did this during the war, but why should we continue to do it in peace times?

Mr. SLEMP. Just a moment. They contend that the salaries paid and the amount expended under this particular lump-sum appropriation are less than would be expended under the statutory provision, so that this represents a net saving to the Government, and I feel very confident, and I am sure the members of the committee feel that that discretion has been exercised very wisely.

Mr. BLANTON. But without any guide or limitation whatever this paragraph gives approximately $600,000 to the Postmaster General and permits him to employ any number without limitation, and to give them any salaries he wants without limitation.

Mr. SLEMP. Of course, we have filed with us here the number of employees, their names, and the compensation paid.

Mr. BLANTON. That is merely a guide to the committee, but is not a limitation on the Postmaster General.

Mr. SLEMP. I will say further that the statement is made that they can take care of 8 per cent increase in the business next year with this same force.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that we have two employees of the Government in another department who are drawing $35,000 a year.

Mr. SLEMP. If this were changed it would result in the payment of an increased amount of money.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman knows that there is another department that is paying $35,000 a year to each of two certain employees.

Mr. SLEMP. The gentleman will understand that I am just as much opposed to that as he is.

Mr. BLANTON. But that is done in another department, and if it is done there it could be done in this department.

Mr. SLEMP. These gentlemen always keep faith with the Congress and with the pledges they make in their statements to the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think this is an unwise provision, and I make the point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill without authority of law.

Mr. SLEMP. It is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is within the province of the Committee on Appropriations to say whether they will make a lump-sum appropriation for a given activity or whether they will make it in detail, or whether they will make a limitation on particular appropriations. This activity is authorized by law. This is the comptroller of the Post Office Department, an office authorized by law.

Mr. SISSON. It is a matter of administration.

Mr. MADDEN. It is simply a matter of the best way to administer the funds set apart for the payment of the expenses of this office. The office of the chief accounting officer of the Post Office Department is created by law, and the force that he must employ is authorized, and the question of the manner of payment is one that should be decided upon the facts; and the committee decided that this was the best way to do it, the most economical way, and that it would bring about the greatest amount of efficiency.

Mr. BLANTON. May I call the attention of the Chair to the language here:

For compensation, to be fixed by the Postmaster General, of such number of employees as may be necessary to audit the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service, $592,790.

All the employees are in the department and the positions are fixed by law. There is no substantive law authorizing the Postmaster General to employ an unlimited number of employees at such salaries as he may deem necessary to fix in his discretion. It is beyond the warrant of law to do that.

Mr. MADDEN. No; the law distinctly provides that the Post Office Department is a going concern. It is a work in progress, and as it increases in volume they may increase the number of people employed in the service in order to keep the work up current. This, it seems to the committee, is the best way to provide for this activity in this case.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any authority in the law for the employment of these people?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any statute which provides for the auditing of these accounts?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. A direct statute?

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe any department could exist without the right to audit its accounts?

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. DOWELL. If that general authority is given without a statute fixing salaries, the committee may permit the Postmaster General to fix those salaries. It seems to me there can be no question about this.

Mr. BLANTON. Then why did the committee insist on designating so many specified positions at such and such salaries on pages 2 and 3, and why was not that left to the discretion of the Postmaster General under a general authorization?

Mr. DOWELL. These salaries are fixed by law. Under this provision, of course, under the general provisions for the existence of the Post Office Department, there would be authority to conduct an accounting department.

Mr. MADDEN. Here is the authority, if the Chair please. This is the law:

The administrative examination of the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service now imposed by law upon the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall be performed on and after July 1, 1921, by a bureau in the Post Office Department to be known as the Bureau of Accounts, which is hereby established for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that the statute?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The Bureau of Accounts shall be under the direction of a comptroller, who shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year. The comptroller shall perform the administrative duties now performed by the Auditor for the Post Office Department and such other duties in relation thereto as the Postmaster General may direct. The appropriation of $5,000 for the salary of the Auditor for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1922 is transferred and made available for the salary of the comptroller, Bureau of Accounts, Post Office Department. The officers and employees of the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department engaged in the administrative examination of accounts shall become officers and employees of the Bureau of Accounts * * *. The appropriations for salaries and for contingent and miscellaneous expenses and tabulating equipment for such office for the fiscal year 1922, and all books, records, documents, papers, furniture, office equipment, and other property shall be apportioned between, transferred to, and made available for the Bureau of Accounts and the General Accounting Office, respectively, on the basis of duties transferred.

Mr. SISSON. I want to call the Chairman's attention to an oversight in reading. He failed to read three or four words. It says "at their grade and salaries on July 1, 1921." So that is fixed by law. I want to say here that the auditor doing this work is one of the most efficient men in this Government. I do not mind calling his name. His name is Cram. Mr. Cram has instituted a system in the Post Office Department, and did it over the protest of a good many people, a system fixing the salaries in accordance with meritorious work of the employees under him. If we had more officials like Mr. Cram we would save millions of dollars in the department service. I think it is not only a matter of administration of the law but authority to the Postmaster General to do the specific things necessary to be done to have this office administered under him in accordance with the new budgetary system that has gone into effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the authority given by law does not authorize the appropriation of a lump sum to employees generally to be fixed by the head of a department, and the point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent and miscellaneous expenses: For miscellaneous items, including purchase, repair, and exchange of typewriters and adding machines, of which not exceeding $200 may be used for furniture and repairs, not exceeding $850 may be used for rental of telephones, and not exceeding $200 may be used for the purchase of law books, books of reference, and city directories, $7,700, to be expended under the direction of the Comptroller of the Post Office Department under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Postmaster General and to operate as a specific exception of the said office from the appropriation for contingent expenses, Post Office Department, unless otherwise provided by law.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am surprised at the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will reserve his ruling and hear the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. As we go along with the bill the Chair will find that we appropriate in several instances—letter carriers, for example—a certain amount of money, and substitute letter carriers, $70,000,000. Does the Chair contend that we have not a right to appropriate a lump sum? We do the same thing for the substitute clerks. That is all done because we have calculated how many people will be employed under the lump sum and whose salaries are fixed by law. It has been the practice all the time in order to shorten up the wording of the bill. If we were to enumerate so many clerks in every class we would have a bill of a couple of hundred pages.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Would the gentleman say that under this provision if it became a law the Postmaster General might, if he wished to do so, employ one person for $20,000?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. TILSON. Would not the language as it stands authorize him—"for compensation to be fixed by the Postmaster General"? Assuming the Postmaster General wished to do a thing of that sort—and I realize that the Postmaster General will be just as much interested as the gentleman and myself to get good service for a reasonable compensation—from the standpoint of a point of order whether or not this language as it stands would not authorize the Postmaster General, if in his discretion or his indiscretion he wished to do so, to give an exorbitant salary?

Mr. MADDEN. If it did, I would not stand for it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Connecticut is correct; it would authorize the Postmaster General to appoint two at $25,000 a year if he saw fit. The Chair was correct in his ruling.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may be permitted to go back to the former paragraph, in order that I may offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to the item just passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Before we agree to it, I would like to know what the gentleman's amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Illinois was on his feet when the Clerk began to read the paragraph. He addressed the Chair but the Chair asked the gentleman to wait until the Clerk had read the paragraph. The Chair thinks that the gentleman has a right to offer his amendment to the other paragraph, because the Chair cut him off.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, after line 13, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For compensation of such number of employees as may be necessary to audit the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service, $592,790."

Mr. BLANTON. I make no objection to that, because it is in accordance with the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call attention to the fact that the Post Office Department has changed the word "audit" to the word "settle." Formerly the Secretary would appoint the Auditor of Accounts of the Post Office Department, but under the new system the President appoints the Auditor for the Post Office Department. The President appointed this auditor making him an independent Auditor for the Post Office Department. What I want to ask is whether the word "audit" instead of "settle" would have any effect on the right of the Post Office Department to pay these claims?

Mr. SLEMP. The Post Office Department does not make the final payments; they simply audit the account.

Mr. SISSON. But somebody ought to have the right to declare the account settled and closed. I presume Mr. Cram must have had some reason for changing the word "audit" to the word "settle."

Mr. SLEMP. The subcommittee struck out the new language and inserted the language now carried in the bill, and that was in accordance with the wishes of the accounting office.

Mr. SISSON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appropriations hereinafter made for the field service of the Post Office Department, except as otherwise provided, shall not be expended for any of the purposes hereinbefore provided for on account of the Post Office Department in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes on the bill, but slightly out of order, as I do not care to talk on this particular section.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee to the fact that we had an understanding with the gentleman from New York that he was to have 15 minutes at this time, because there was not sufficient time to grant him that time in general debate.

Mr. SLEMP. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the subcommittee reporting this bill, in my opinion, have been guilty of two very flagrant acts of inconsistency. The committee is to add $200,000 to the appropriation for village postal delivery, without being asked for it and against the recommendation of the Budget Bureau, with which we are expected and presumed to cooperate, and, with paradoxical inconsistency, it has stricken out the appropriation for air mail service amounting to $1,935,000, wiping out the entire appropriation, although that appropriation was recommended by the Budget Bureau and notwithstanding that it is desired by the Post Office Department.

There is, of course, this difference: The appropriation for village mail delivery, which is to be enhanced at the hands of the committee—because the chairman was authorized to offer an amendment on the floor increasing the appropriation by $200,000—will furnish patronage to a few local bosses and aid in the repair, perhaps, of party fences. The appropriation eliminated will furnish campaign material to make a demagogic appeal to constituents who can see no further than the end of their whiskers.

As to the justification for the abandonment of the plan with which we started out in the course of Budget reform, no intelligent man can devise a sane or adequate apology. The Postmaster General, in his annual report for this year, on page 34, recommends the complete abolition of the village delivery. Instead of following his suggestion, we will be asked to add $200,000 to the appropriation, the obvious effect of which is to provide about 200 jobs for needy partisan villagers. I hear a gentleman suggest that that is a very good reason.

In striking out the appropriation for air mail service we have emulated the cocksure prophets of the last century who opposed the carrying of mail by the few straggling railroads, which were just on the verge of transforming a wonderful experiment into a practical realization.

The mossbacks of those days could see no future for those darned new-fangled things on rails which emitted fire to burn down their barns by night and scare their cattle by day. They were opposed to the carrying of mail by railroads, as to-day they are opposed to the carrying of mail by airplane. They could see nothing beyond the safe and sane stagecoach of their venerable ancestors and despised and feared anything that threatened any taint to the atmosphere more novel or exhilarating than that of the stagecoach and stable.

What is the effect of striking out the airplane appropriation? What does it mean? It means the abandonment of 15 aviation stations established at great expense all over this land from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and with that goes all of their equipment and 75 airplanes, which will be discarded. In short, it means that this valuable Government property shall be sacrificed or ruthlessly thrown into the scrap heap. In the name of common sense, have we not gone far enough in such foolishness already? It means the throwing out of work of nearly 500 employees. Now, as to my whispering friend, who says that the employment of 200 for postal delivery in villages is an adequate reason for the appropriation, is it not worth consideration that you are throwing out of employment 500 men of the aviation service, who have devoted their lives to the study of this branch of art, and who are fitted for no other occupation in God's world if they are deprived of their posts? It means perhaps a fatal blow to all progress so far made in the delimitation of air lines and in the other advances in aviation transportation.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. I am with the gentleman so far as the air mail service is concerned, but I take it that the argument he makes in respect to throwing these men out of employment would apply with equal force to the village delivery. I also take it that the gentleman, living in New York City, is not affected by the village delivery. However, in those towns that have had the delivery, to now have it taken away would deprive them of what is now being given to the people of the city of New York.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is correct, and I am very glad the gentleman has brought that up, because I hope that in anything that I have said I shall not be understood as opposing village delivery. I do not oppose it. I believe everything should be done to make the Postal Service effective and beneficial to all the people, and that the people living in small villages, towns, and hamlets are entitled to the same consideration as that accorded to the people of the greater cities.

Mr. DOWELL. With that explanation, I heartily agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank you. Now, the act of this committee means, in addition, the deliberate short-sighted refusal of an opportunity to enhance the public revenue in the near future in a very material manner. I know this will be disputed, but I shall prove my statement by the very testimony in the hearings upon which the recommendation is based to strike out the appropriation. Mr. Chairman, these are the things which animate the cartoonist when he draws Members of Congress as short, pudgy gentlemen, with chin whiskers and with no common sense, and not a spark of foresight or of ideality.

There are four classes of people who cheerfully coincide with this pretended economy: First, there are the men who, like their predecessors in the last century, opposed the evolution from the stagecoach to the rail; second, there are the commercial adventurers who are planning the establishment of airplane lines and the securing of fat star-route contracts for mail transportation, and these, by the way, will be real star-route lines, because their lines of travel will be among the stars.

These are the men who are anticipating that the United States Government shall take its hands off in the matter of aerial progress and leave the field to them to be exploited in the future.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield at that point for a question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman any assurance that these private individuals will establish these aerial lines? If he has, I shall be disposed to accept this action of the committee in striking out this one, but, so far as I know, there is not much immediate hope that private individuals are going to do that thing.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will show you what they are dreaming of. On page 282 of the hearings, Col. Shaughnessy, who was before the committee, said:

> We are led to believe that during the coming year the commercial interests in the United States who are looking into the aviation situation will begin to establish air lines and in that way provide service to relieve us of the necessity of making further extensions.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Do I understand the Post Office Department recommended the elimination of this item?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; they did not.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Or was it the attitude of the subcommittee that framed this bill?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The subcommittee did not recommend the elimination.

Mr. SISSON. I do not know whether the gentleman knows about the subcommittee or not.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I thought the gentleman was on that committee.

Mr. SISSON. We recommended the item asked for by the Postmaster General, and the full committee cut it down.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of course, the gentleman probably knows this item has never gone on in the House. It has been recommended a few times by the committee, but has gone out on a point of order. The Senate has always placed it on, and undoubtedly will do so this year.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I know that. Now, as to the reasons for the objection of the railroads, on page 283 of the hearings we find this. Col. Shaughnessy, still testifying, says, referring to a reduction in the expense of operation:

> We reduced our expenses to the extent of about $675,000 a year. That came out of the railroad appropriation.

Think that over! On page 284, continuing his testimony, he says:

> The records of the comptroller show that $850,406.19 was so spent in 1920. That is to say, this sum was diverted, under a technical interpretation of the law, from the railroad appropriation to the air-mail service.

Now, can we see anything? Can we glimpse the nigger in the woodpile? The railroads do not like the idea of the mails being carried by airplane. They are in the position themselves to-day that was occupied by the owners of the stage coach of the last century, who opposed the transmission of mail over steel rails by railroad trains. So that for once we find intended rivals joined together in opposition to this particular appropriation. The airplane men are looking for fat contracts in the future, and the railroad men are opposed to having their appropriation diverted to the air mail service.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am in harmony with the gentleman's position for the air service. I am in favor of it. As I understand it, they are not going to eliminate the service from New York to San Francisco. That will be a main line?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Oh, yes; they are going to eliminate everything.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can the gentleman tell us how near self-supporting it is, or whether the receipts exceed the expenditures?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The only line in operation to-day of airplane transportation is that extending from New York to California, and if this appropriation is eliminated it means that that line will be discontinued, involving the abandonment of all its stations, and all its equipment, and all its accumulated experience will be thrown in the scrap heap.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it proposed to eliminate that line?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Absolutely.

Mr. QUIN. Can the gentleman tell me what the rate is on that line for first-class mail matter?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The Post Office Department in carrying on this experiment of airplane delivery has not charged any higher rate of postage for air letters than they have for any other. The selection of the mail is largely a matter of chance and of circumstance, the object of the postal authorities being to expedite the service of mail and to advance the speed of delivery on the Pacific coast. Under the practice which they are now following they have 21 sailings a day, sailings only during the daytime. The character of the airplanes which they have, which have come to them from the War Department, forbid them to fly at night. They can not fly at night at the present time. So these planes which are now operated carry the mail, say, from New York to Cleveland, where it is dropped and taken up by train and advanced to another section on the line, and the plane which has carried the Cleveland mail takes up a pouch that has left New York before the airplane left in the morning. In that way they succeed in advancing the mail across the entire country 24 hours ahead of train service. But the sailing time of these planes between New York and San Francisco, and the reverse, is 36 hours, and if we had a suitable form of planes to permit them to engage in continuous flight they could without doubt, I am sure, carry the mail across the continent in 48 hours.

Now, as to the cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Now, as to the cost. The modern type of airplane which they are now using carries 800 pounds of mail. There are 40 letters to the pound. That makes 32,000 letters which may be carried. At 2 cents a letter, that would amount to $640. Now, if the Government would charge, say, the special-delivery rate for this material, as they started out in the beginning to do, because, after all, an airplane letter is a special-delivery letter—if they charged 10 cents per letter, the revenue from that one airplane flying from New York to Chicago would amount to $3,200.

The distance from New York to Chicago is 770 miles. The expense of such a flight, for operation and maintenance, is 75 cents per mile. The total cost of the flight would therefore be $577.50, showing a balance of profit to the Government of $2,622.50 for each plane.

Gentlemen, this service has possibilities that we ought not to ignore. Col. Shaughnessy, testifying in the record of the hearings, at page 294, said that it is costing us 75 cents for operation and maintenance per mile flown and the capacity of the plane is 800 pounds.

It is a simple matter of calculation. I have had prepared some figures. For the six months ending December 21, 1921, the air mail service carried 548,771 pounds of first-class mail. At 40 letters to a pound that makes the total number of letters carried 21,950,840.

The postage received on those letters was $439,016.80, nearly half of the appropriation which it is proposed to eliminate. Now, at 10 cents a letter the revenue would have been $2,195,084. As an offset to that, what are the salaries? There are 479 employees, and the annual salary is $787,620 for one year. For half a year, that is, the period for which the figures are calculated, the salaries would aggregate $393,810, leaving a margin of profit to the Government of $1,800,000 for six months.

That is why I say that in eliminating this factor of airplane delivery we are shutting out from the coffers of the Government the opportunity to gain an immense revenue.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do.

Mr. MANN. Is it practical to have 10 cents postage on a letter carried by an airplane?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think it is.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It is a special-delivery letter. We use the special delivery to-day.

Mr. MANN. The airplane service is once a day. If a man drops a letter in the post office in time for the air-mail service that day, very well. But if he drops it in too late, would the gentleman have the letter held for 24 hours?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; if he wanted it to go by air mail. If not it would go by train.

Mr. MANN. That would make it much later in getting to its destination than by the regular mail.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If they were delayed 24 hours they can only blame themselves. They ought to know the time at which the airplane leaves. They are confronted with the same difficulty with respect to the ocean liners. Their dates of sailings are published in the papers.

Mr. MANN. But we do not charge any extra fee for that mail. Take it from New York to Chicago; that is a little less than a 24-hour run. Certainly no one would want to have a letter held over 23 or 24 hours because it has a 10-cent stamp on it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Such letters are not held to-day, and the conditions would be no worse by cooperation and employment of the air service. I would not use any other stamp than the usual special-delivery stamp, leaving it to the discretion of the Post Office Department to manage the cooperation between air and rail service to the best advantage. An airplane, for instance, leaves New York at 7.15 in the morning. It goes to Cleveland, Ohio, and there it picks up mail that has gone out on the midnight train from New York. It is therefore able to advance the delivery of that mail—presumably special-delivery mail—between seven and eight hours at Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. What is the life of an airplane under the circumstances you have presented?

Mr. GRIFFIN. About five or six hundred hours, ranging from 40,000 to 50,000 miles. I will insert the details at this point, taken from page 291 of the hearings:

Type number.	First trip.	Miles.	Hours.	Condition.
JN4-H 12	May 15, 1918	40,666	588	Serviceable: stored.
JN4-H 17	May 17, 1918	41,347	597	Do.
JN4-H 11	June 1, 1918	39,690	577	Do.
R-4 31	July 19, 1919	43,437	498	Good; in service.
DeH-4 71	Mar. 3, 1919	62,136	699	Do.
DeH-4 99	Nov. 15, 1919	65,663	712	Do.
DeH-4 104	Dec. 17, 1919	58,219	634	Do.

Mr. WATSON. How much per flight is that, in accordance with the expense of the plane? You say it costs 75 cents a mile. Does that include the value of the plane?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; and the operation and everything.

Mr. WATSON. Does that include depreciation?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; depreciation. In the hearings here, on one of the pages, you will find a summary of the life of an airplane.

Mr. SLEMP. It is on page 291 of the hearings.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes. There you will find the number of trips scheduled in three years from July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1921. The number of trips attempted was 10,964. The number of trips completed is 10,353; the average performance was 85.68 miles. The miles traveled was 2,264,295. The average operation cost per mile in the three years from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1921, was 84½ cents per mile. In the three months from July 1, 1921, to October 31, 1921, the average cost was 75¼ cents. I will print at this point the table taken from the hearings:

	3 years, July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1921.	4 months, July 1, 1921, to October 31, 1921.
Number of trips scheduled	12,438	2,688
Number of trips attempted	10,964	2,670
Number of trips completed	10,353	2,636
Weather encountered—trips in fog	4,282	540
Weather encountered—trips clear	6,682	2,130
Forced landings—mechanical troubles	1,001	102
Forced landings due to other causes	1,115	105
Mail flights—miles possible	2,642,685	536,210
Mail flights—miles traveled	2,264,295	529,777
Average performance	85.68	98.8
Number letters carried	77,507,040	13,976,560
Average operation cost per mile	$0.84½	$0.75¼

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is simply operation. It does not include investment and depreciation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. There is no investment. They get the planes from the War Department.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Of course, they cost something to construct and the depreciation is very acute. This money, as I understand, simply covers the cost of operation?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No. On page 290 you will find that the Post Office now does all its own repairing and rebuilding work, also all work on Army ships, to make them mail carrying. Notwithstanding the assumption of this burden the total expenditure in the air-mail service per mile flown has been reduced from $1.43 to $1.04, which figures include the overhead expenses. Up to June 30, 1921, the department did pay airplane companies for rebuilding and converting planes the sum of $276,109.08, and eight planes were purchased for $200,000, a total of $476,109.08; but at present the estimated flying cost of 75 cents includes the entire expense of maintenance and operation.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. Does not the gentleman think that this service could be handled under private contract with aviating companies at a less rate and more practically than the Government is handling it?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Personally, I do not.

Mr. PARRISH. The Third Assistant Postmaster General, as I understand it, gives it as his opinion that this service can be handled under private contract and at a reduced rate from that suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I take it that that is more of a philosophical opinion on the question of Government ownership and operation than anything else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STEENERSON. This subject of airplane transportation is a very interesting one, and we have not got very far toward a solution. As you all know, when an airplane service was first authorized the Government operated the lines. We had a statute, and have yet, authorizing the Postmaster General to issue a distinctive air-mail stamp, and providing that the rate should be not exceeding 24 cents an ounce. But the act had no minimum, so that it was within the discretion of the Postmaster General to fix any figure, as he understood it, from nothing up to 24 cents an ounce. He fixed it at different amounts at different times. My recollection is that it was tried at 8 cents, then 6 cents, then 4 cents, and finally the extra charge was dropped and the airplane mail was carried at the regular postage. The committee had some correspondence. I introduced a resolution of inquiry on the subject and got a very full answer explaining the reason why the distinctive stamp was abolished. Of course there was no distinctive stamp needed when the postage was the same whether the mail went by rail or airplane, and the explanation was that people would not pay the extra postage; that the airplanes could get no load. The planes started from down here in Potomac Park with only a very few pounds, less than a man could carry on his back. In order to have the airplane travel they had to put on ballast. So they thought they would abolish the distinctive stamp and the extra postage and take any kind of mail that was available. Manifestly since this rule was inaugurated the air mail brings in no extra revenue, no extra income to the United States. It is a method of transportation that costs a great deal. It has been estimated that it costs one hundred times as much as it costs to transport mail by rail. Lately it has been estimated to cost about sixty times the cost by rail. We are now paying about $100,000,000 for the transportation of the mail, and if we should pay sixty times as much and transport all the mail by airplane it would cost us $600,000,000, or more than the total revenues of the Post Office Department.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman means $6,000,000,000, does he not?

Mr. STEENERSON. Whatever it is, it is more than the total revenues of the department.

Mr. JEFFERIS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska for a question.

Mr. JEFFERIS of Nebraska. I should like to know whether the gentleman is in favor of the air mail service or against it? Does he favor it, or does he think it ought to be abolished?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am trying to explain the present situation, and if the gentleman will have patience, I think he will find out something. We have got thus far: We know that it is impracticable to get any extra revenue by making an extra charge and having a distinctive stamp for the air mail service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. Some time ago the department advised me that there had been a conference between the different branches of the Government interested in aeronautics, and that they wanted to submit propositions for a contract air mail service, and after that they submitted information that they had gathered from the various European countries and elsewhere on this subject, and they cited cases in Holland, Belgium, and France where this contract air mail service is in successful operation. These companies are engaged in carrying all kinds of small freight, as well as passengers, and they take mail in addition to their express and passenger business, and carry it at a reasonable price. So, lately, I introduced a bill on this subject which simply authorizes the Postmaster General to make contracts for carrying mail by air service, prescribing a postage three times the ordinary postage, payable by a distinctive stamp, giving the Government the regular postage and giving the contractor the other two-thirds. In other words, if that plan should be worked out, the Government would not be called upon to pay any extra charge for the expediting of the mail, if it was expedited by airplane. The Government would get the ordinary postage, and what was charged more than that would go to the contractor. We held a hearing on that proposition lately, and as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH] has stated, the Postmaster General approved the idea. There were very many changes suggested in the bill, which is simply tentative, but he approved the idea of a contract mail service; and I call attention to the fact that ever since the air mail service was started the Post Office Department has told us that it was an experimental service, and that when the art of flying is sufficiently developed and a sufficient load can be carried and there is a sufficient factor of safety, they would like to see these private companies undertake this transportation the same as they undertake railroad transportation or star-route transportation.

They have stated that they would like to have this hearing continued for the purpose of calling into conference those interested in aeronautics, and a date has been fixed some two weeks hence for the purpose of hearing those interested. I myself have received several letters on the subject from people who are engaged in transporting goods and passengers, or who propose to transport goods and passengers if they can get the business on a plan of this kind. They will all be invited to the hearing.

The trouble with the present Government-operated air mail service is that although we have a line from New York to San Francisco that carries mail, there is a demand from every quarter of the country for similar service. There is a demand to have it to Chicago and Minneapolis and St. Paul and St. Louis and Atlanta and New Orleans. In fact, it would take millions and millions of dollars to satisfy these demands. The only justification that has been advanced, and which I think can be advanced for this transcontinental air line from New York to San Francisco is that it is of value as a military proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I should like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for five minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think from that point of view this transcontinental line may be justified.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question just there?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does not the gentleman consider that it is some achievement to have carried 22,000,000 letters in six months?

Mr. STEENERSON. Wait a minute. I do not want to discuss the figures in this report. The figures given by the department do not agree. Mr. Shaughnessy stated before our committee only a few days ago that it cost a dollar a mile to operate a flying machine, and that it carries 350 to 400 pounds of mail.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Seventy-five and a quarter cents.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not want to have any dispute about that. The testimony was before our committee, not the gentleman's committee. I have only a short time, and I wish to proceed without interruption. I say this transcontinental air mail line may be justified, and can be justified, on the theory that it is an experiment and that it develops our knowledge of aeronautics.

Now, the fact that it is 3,000 miles long is of great value, because there is where the air mail is of benefit, because it will expedite the mails for long distances, but for short distances, like from Washington to New York, it is of no use, because it delays it instead of expediting it. One of the objections to the air mail service heretofore has been that suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the gathering of the mail. If it is put into the mail box, even if you have it marked for the airplane mail, it would not be collected any sooner than other mail, and it does not expedite it. As it is now, you can not tell whether you get your mail carried by air or by railroad. Nobody can tell. Probably 1 out of 25,000 gets it carried by the expensive method where the others have it carried by the ordinary means. It is believed by the Second Assistant Postmaster General that a private contractor would have a special interest in getting this business and could relieve the Government in gathering the mail. They could have boxes placed at depots, like they have in New York and Chicago, for the fast mail, the Twentieth Century mail, where they have a box containing hundreds of pounds of mail, and the business men and the big banking and trust companies that have mail to expedite send a special messenger there a few minutes before the train starts, and it goes on that train. Something like that could be done by the air-mail contractor. He could arrange with the users of the mail, the big financial companies, whereby they would be willing to pay 6 or 8 or 10 cents to have that mail expedited, and a special clerk could take it to the airplane station. In that way a man could get business enough to pay for the whole transaction. There is no question but that the financial mail could be made a profitable source of revenue in this respect. The financial concerns in many cities have written the Post Office Committee stating that they would be willing to pay $8,000 or $10,000 a day for a fast mail to Chicago, airplane mail, that ran at night or daytime. It would be good business for them to put on an extra stamp and have it gathered at the different houses and expedited by fast mail. You could get plenty of business and make it profitable without any expense to the Government. It is obvious that a check for $100,000 or $1,000,000, if it can reach a clearing house a few hours earlier, saving hundreds of dollars of interest, is desirable.

We are in hopes that this theory may be developed and made practicable. It has been practicable in other places and we think it can be made practicable here. I shall be glad to have the Members of the House attend the hearings on this subject, as well as all those interested in aeronautics generally. [Applause.]

The following correspondence will show what we have in mind relative to air mail:

MAY 24, 1921.

The honorable the POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAYS: I have your favor of the 7th instant relative to amendment of section 3 of the current Post Office appropriation act, also of the 9th relative to the comptroller's decision, also yours of the 12th inclosing memorandum prepared by the Second Assistant Postmaster General on the entire subject of air-mail service, and I have called these matters to the attention of the committee, but so far no action has been taken.

In view of the suggestions contained in the memorandum on the subject of making provisions for reorganization of the entire air-mail service, I have the honor to suggest that the department prepare a detailed plan at an early date—suggestions for legislation to carry the same into effect on the lines therein mentioned. Frequently since the subject of air-mail legislation has been before this committee in the past, it has been stated by the representatives of the department that the direct operation by the Government of air-mail routes was only temporary, with a view to establishing its feasibility and practicability, but that ultimately the service should be carried on by private enterprise under contract with the department in analogy to the manner in which railroad and steamship mail service is now carried on.

It is stated in the memorandum: "The theory upon which the air-mail service was started by the department was to do the necessary pioneering work to demonstrate that an air service was possible. This work has been done, and the time has arrived for the necessary constructive legislation to make it possible for private interests to get started." The memorandum also points out that in July, 1838, provision was made for carrying the mail by rail at not more than 25 per cent above the cost of similar service by post coaches, and it is also pointed out that some countries of Europe authorize the private contractor by air route to charge an extra compensation, the extra charge to be retained by the contracting company.

These suggestions seem to me to point the way for desirable legislation, and I have the honor to request that a draft of such legislation, or at least an outline thereof, be submitted, and I will at an early date call the committee together for the purpose of considering the same. The committee would be glad to have the views of the department specifically on the amount of extra compensation to be allowed the contractor for carrying the mail by air, and what the amount of the extra compensation charged to the mailer and kept by the contractor should be, and the manner in which it should be collected. If your department will indicate the time when these matters could be submitted and when the officials of the department can be present to explain their views to the committee, I will call an early meeting of the committee for the purpose of hearing them.

The consideration by the committee of the suggestions contained in your letters of May 7 and May 20 regarding equipment to be supplied by the War Department could be considered at the same time as the other suggestions I mentioned are taken up.

Very respectfully,

H. STEENERSON, Chairman.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 12, 1921.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
House of Representatives.

In re air mail.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The situation in the above matter in the department is more or less unsatisfactory and has given us much concern. I am taking the liberty of inclosing herewith:

(a) Copy of the original memorandum on the situation prepared today by Col. Shaughnessy, Second Assistant Postmaster General.

(b) Copy of the recommendations which he makes in the matter.

I will be very grateful if these might have your consideration and if you will aid in such action as may be necessary to take care of the situation. I am sending copies also to Senator TOWNSEND and Congressmen Good and MADDEN.

Col. Shaughnessy will be very glad to come up at any time. The matter really requires some real consideration and attention.

Sincerely, yours,

WILL H. HAYS.

The same sort of direct action should be taken at this time with reference to aviation. In my judgment, the air-mail situation should be immediately reviewed by the Congress, and after an investigation a decision arrived at as to whether the precedent established above should be followed and how liberal an allowance above railway-mail pay should be authorized, or whether the continental practice of permitting an extra charge on mail matter transported by plane should be adopted, this extra charge to be retained in whole or in part by the transporting company.

The continental practice is, in my opinion, much preferable from every standpoint. Departmentally, it removes the discrimination more or less in effect at the present time, wherein only a very small portion of the available first-class mail is handled by the Air Mail Service. The postage rate being the same for either train or plane, it follows that some letters are given better service than others, it being entirely problematical which way the posted letter will travel.

With the extra charge going to the private company, there is the incentive, now lacking, to build up a highly specialized important mail service between the larger cities that would willingly contribute additional postage for very fast handling. This consists of bank mail, brokerage-house mail, etc., involving financial transactions where in gaining a day on bank clearings would save large interest charges. The department's experience with the extra postage was not successful, because there was no well-handled advertising or personal solicitation such as would be the case with a private company. This method is working very successfully on the Continent. I am informed that in Holland alone there are already some twenty-odd mail-planes privately operated; and if it can be done there it, of course, can be done here with a greater field to draw from. It is requested that I be advised quickly if you approve of the policy outlined herein.

E. H. SHAUGHNESSY,
Second Assistant.

MAY 12, 1921.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of rewards for the detection, arrest, and conviction of post-office burglars, robbers, and highway mail robbers: Provided, That rewards may be paid, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, when an offender of the class mentioned was killed in the act of committing the crime or in resisting lawful arrest: And provided further, That of the amount herein appropriated not to exceed $5,000 may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, for the purpose of securing information concerning violations of the postal laws and for services and information looking toward the apprehension of criminals, $25,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is there any reason for this appropriation since the department has been using the marines and arming the employees in the service?

Mr. SLEMP. I will say that the amount of $25,000 is the amount that has been carried for a great many years.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the reason I am asking the question.

Mr. SLEMP. It is a very small amount.

Mr. BLANTON. The department has made arrangements where certain employees in every office must carry arms, and in some offices where the employees are women those women have been forced to put on .45's.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Does the gentleman mean 45 size?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows what I meant. I thought possibly we could do away with this item of expense.

Mr. SLEMP. I think we had better keep this item in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to clerks and employees at first and second class post offices, including substitutes for clerks and employees absent without pay, $100,000,000.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against this paragraph. I would like to know what this item of $100,000,000 is for. Is it for clerks, special clerks, foremen, superintendents, or what? There are ordinary clerks and there are special clerks and other distinct classes of employees.

Mr. MADDEN. It includes everybody.

Mr. ROSSDALE. This item really ought to be divided so that Congress will know for what and for whom we are legislating. To put such a large amount in a lump sum I do not think is fair to Members of the House, because they do not and can not know for whom and for what this legislation is being enacted.

Mr. SLEMP. The salaries are classified by statute, each particular grade and the number of clerks in the respective grade. All this is fixed by law.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I want to call the attention of the committee and of the House to one item that is proposed to be included in this $100,000,000 appropriation. The department issued instructions to the various postmasters throughout the country, instructing them to submit names of such fifth-grade clerks as the postmasters deemed worthy for promotion as special clerks. They divided this lump sum which the department has for that purpose into 25 per cent for such clerks as are employed upon the windows, as they call it, or have or are engaged in special occupations, and 75 per cent of this lump sum was to be awarded to distributers—that is, to those clerks separating and distributing the mail, and that means to all those who are expressly assigned to sorting the mail. There is a peculiar situation existing in the post office in connection with this. There are more men now who have the classification of special clerk and who are employed as such than the 25 per cent that the department quota calls for. Consequently, the postmasters are called upon to make recommendations for promotions that the clerks so recommended can never get, and no post-office clerk throughout the country, no matter how proficient or deserving he or she may be, will be able to get by or within this 25 per cent quota. It will not make any difference whether he is engaged in banking, on the money-order window, or whether his occupation involves the handling of large sums of money or whether it is of a very skilled or technical nature. They can not possibly get an increase under this 25–75 division. I do not like to vote for something blindly, and I believe the committee ought to tell us exactly how many special clerks are provided for in this great lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. SLEMP. In the $1,400 grade there are 8,122; in the $1,500 grade there are 4,458; in the $1,600 grade, 3,317; in the $1,700 grade, 6,009; in the $1,800 grade, 21,771.

Mr. ROSSDALE. How many in the $1,900 and $2,000 special-clerk grades?

Mr. SLEMP. In the special class at $1,900 there are 2,104 and at $2,000 there are 4,010, making a total of 6,114. That leaves in the supervising positions, where the salaries range from $2,100 to $4,400, between 4,000 and 5,000, and they are also subdivided into various grades.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Can the gentleman tell me how much of an increase in those two grades of $1,900 and $2,000 there is over the present or previous fiscal-year appropriation?

Mr. SLEMP. I could not say. No one can tell as to the character of service performed.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Then we are gambling with the appropriation?

Mr. SLEMP. Slightly. The basic salaries are fixed by statute absolutely.

Mr. ROSSDALE. I want to say in connection with this that I was once a post-office clerk; that I was once a distributor; and that I was also employed on a window. Knowing and understanding the nature of the services performed by these men, I do not want to see any discrimination between these classes of employees. I am certain it ought not to be left blindly to the department to automatically decide as to how many or how much the department would allow. Congress ought to do that.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSSDALE. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. How is Congress going to know how many men are distributing mail and how many money-order clerks ought to be promoted to the grade of special clerk?

Mr. ROSSDALE. Congress could know that very well if they wanted to know.

Mr. BLACK. It seems to me that that is strictly an administrative function of the Post Office Department.

Mr. ROSSDALE. How does Congress know how many clerks are needed? Why, by the Postmaster General ascertaining these needs from the various postmasters and then making recommendations to the committee here and to Congress. How do we know anything at all about the department? Through the information received from the Postmaster General's office.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. ROSSDALE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Up to within a very recent period we made appropriations specifically, enumerating the number of clerks in each class, and at the end making the appropriation. We never made an appropriation sufficient to pay the salary of the number of clerks that we enumerated. It had to be left to the Post Office Department. We always provided for more clerks than we appropriated for. The result was that where there was a certain number of clerks, say, 2,000 clerks of a certain class, authorized, and no appropriation made for it, all through the service there was more or less dissatisfaction because the whole 2,000 were not appointed. When we adopted the classification act fixing the salaries automatically and in some cases of special clerks for efficiency, we thought we were adopting a reform by appropriating a lump sum.

Mr. ROSSDALE. In my opinion it is not a reform to give this lump-sum appropriation. A great injury is going to be done to a class of very deserving employees. I do not think Congress ought to permit that sort of a thing to go on year after year. Men who devote their lives to the public service at a small rate of pay are entitled to some consideration by way of promotion for efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROSSDALE. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in making this objection is not to hold up the bill, which in general is a very good bill, but rather to bring to the attention of the Post Office Department the fact that Congress wants these men looked out for, that the postmasters know best who are efficient and deserve promotion, that Congress does not intend to have the department send an order to the postmasters throughout the country that is not intended to be lived up to, that it costs a considerable sum of money to print the order and mail it through the country, and that the men have a right to believe when they are asked to present their own efficiency records that the Government is honest about it and actually intends to promote them if they are deserving. That was the purpose of my objection, and I now withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

For unusual conditions at post offices, $150,000.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking the chairman a question I move to strike out the last word. What was the amount of the appropriation for this service during the last fiscal year?

Mr. SLEMP. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Has the gentleman any information as to where the money was expended?

Mr. SLEMP. Wherever there were unusual conditions throughout the country. It is very much curtailed now. It is going on now some in Alaska and all over the country, in small allotments.

It is now running down the expenses on this fiscal year. One-half is now on the basis of $75,000.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that during the last fiscal year in which the previous Postmaster General was in office more than 50 per cent of this money was expended in Texas, a large part of it in the district of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. MADDEN. They were entitled to it. There were one or two towns that grew up of a sudden out of nothing, until they were large cities. They did not have a postmaster. The oil development grew up there.

Mr. MANN. And it was on account of the popularity of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. MADDEN. It was necessary to establish the post offices and appoint postmasters in the places where oil development was, and it happened that the development was in Texas, and if it had happened to be in Maryland the same thing would have applied.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. For instance, at such oil fields as Ranger, Eastland, Cisco, Breckenridge, Caddo, Desdemona, Wichita Falls, Burkburnett, and Mexia, and other places in Texas, it became necessary to take care of unusual conditions. At Mexia there is an oil well now flowing as much as 10,000 barrels a day.

People congregated at these oil fields from Maryland, from Pennsylvania, from Ohio, from New York, from Boston, even, and some little villages grew up in a few days to cities of approximately 25,000 people, and it was necessary for them to have mail. Eastern business men sent as far as 40 miles away for mail, and had their mail addressed to offices 40 miles away, to a place where there was no congestion, in order that they could get it earlier. Does not the gentleman think that under such unusual conditions as that money should be spent to benefit eastern men, even in Texas?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I think when the conditions justify the money should be expended where needed. I trust the gentleman under this administration will be able to see that the postal needs of his district are met by the required appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For village delivery service in towns and villages having post offices of the second or third class, and in communities adjacent to cities having city delivery, $1,300,000.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SLEMP: Page 12, line 6, after the word "delivery," strike out "$1,300,000" and insert "$1,500,000."

Mr. SLEMP. I would like to say that that amendment was authorized by the full Committee on Appropriations, to enlarge the amount from $1,300,000 to $1,500,000.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Do I understand this additional appropriation will continue the service of the village delivery where it is already established?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLEMP. I will.

Mr. ROACH. Do I understand that if your amendment carries it will be sufficient to maintain the present village delivery service?

Mr. SLEMP. In all places where it now exists, taking care of all the applications for new village service and also about 15 or 20 per cent increase.

Mr. ROACH. It then contemplates the extension of the service as well as maintaining the present delivery service? Does it place any limitation on the extension of the population?

Mr. SLEMP. By limitation of 1,500 on the population and $5,000 postal receipts. In this service there are about 86 cities now having village delivery that really were justified in having city delivery on account of their postal receipts, and this really is carrying the mail to 86 cities at a cheaper rate than if they were transferred to the grade to which they belonged.

Mr. ROACH. I am not only in favor of maintaining the present delivery service, but I am in favor of extending that service to all that are entitled to it under the present rules and regulations. It has been stated officially to me that unless this appropriation was materially increased there could be no extension of this village delivery service.

Mr. SLEMP. I beg to say that the appropriation required to take care of the village delivery service was $1,200,000, and so $1,500,000, we think, will take care of all the existing needs.

Mr. ROACH. What was the appropriation last year?

Mr. SLEMP. It was $1,500,000, but they are now expending $1,200,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Who has authority to discontinue the village delivery service?

Mr. SLEMP. Congress would have to discontinue it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is established by the Postmaster General, is it not?

Mr. SLEMP. But we appropriate for it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is nothing in this bill that discontinues it?

Mr. STEENERSON. Congress does not establish village delivery. We authorize the department to establish it. The language might be debatable as to whether the department, if authorized to establish it, might not also have authority to discontinue it.

Mr. SLEMP. The Post Office Department has not discontinued village delivery service——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And there is no purpose in this bill to discontinue it?

Mr. SLEMP. And I will say that the Postmaster General and the Post Office Department would be responsive to the desire of Congress as expressed in the appropriations.

Mr. ROACH. As the law now stands, the Post Office Department would have no authority to discontinue the village delivery service?

Mr. SLEMP. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think it might be well enough to say, for the information of the Members of the House, that the village delivery service cost to-day is about $1,200,000 a year. Eighty-six of the places where village delivery exists are entitled to go into the City Delivery Service. The presumption is that they will go into the City Delivery Service; they are entitled to it, both on account of population and receipts. If those 86 villages should go into the City Delivery Service, of course it would make 86 more places where village delivery service could be established. There are now 749 villages where the village delivery service is established. The $200,000 provided for in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP] not only would maintain all the existing village delivery service but it would provide for the transfer of the 86 that may go into the higher class. It would not only do that but it would provide also for an extension of about 20 per cent to the existing villages in which village delivery exists.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In a moment. Let me make this statement.

It would be unfair to assume that you could establish all the village delivery service throughout the United States at once. There are many, many thousands of villages, and you will have to extend the service gradually to the country, and if we can extend it at the rate provided for in this bill there need be no complaint from any village anywhere in the United States that is really entitled to the service.

It is the intention of the Committee on Appropriations in offering this amendment to serve notice on the Post Office Department that we are in favor of a continuance of the village delivery service. [Applause.] We are in favor of its reasonable extension from time to time. [Applause.] So that whatever the attitude of the Post Office Department may be in respect to the advisability of continuing this service, the Committee on Appropriations wishes it understood and begs to express their opinion to the House through me—and I know I speak the unanimous sentiment of the committee when I say this—that we hope there will be no further alarm expressed anywhere in respect to the continuance of the village delivery service. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. In connection with that I would like to state that the Postmaster General last Monday before the joint commission made a statement in which he practically withdrew his recommendation for this reduction, and said that he did not favor any reduction in the service.

Mr. MADDEN. That is fine.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was very much impressed with what the gentleman said. I was wondering, though, in view of the fact that the Postmaster General has expressed an unfavorable opinion in his annual report——

Mr. MADDEN. He has expressed a new opinion.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Inasmuch as he has expressed an unfavorable opinion in his annual report, whether this policy would receive much encouragement from the administration?

Mr. MADDEN. It will, undoubtedly.

Mr. STEENERSON. The Postmaster General was perfectly satisfied with the proposed action.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP]. I am in favor of the extension of this service if the people in the small towns desire it.

But I want to call the attention of this body to something that is not understood. If all the villages in this country receive their mail by free delivery, the approximate cost will be over $30,000,000 a year. I am not opposed to it if the people want it in these small towns. But I call the attention of this House, and I have called the attention of the department from time to time to the fact that if the department would adopt a reasonable charge for box rent in these small towns, the most of them would prefer to go and get their mail at the local post office. The trouble is that at the present time you are taxing by excessive box rent the small towns for the privilege of going to the local post office and getting their mail, and you are not only taxing them but you are outrageously taxing them. You do this by charging the people in these small towns an excessive rate of rent for a box, and they must be their own carriers.

In my district we have two that have the free delivery. I am in favor of their receiving it. You have probably 20 more that ought to have it if they want it. Most of these towns would prefer to go to the local post office and get their mail if you would let them do it at a reasonable rate for the box rent. But the people of those towns are charged in less than a year more than the entire cost of the outfit that the local post office has for the handling of the mail. It is a tax on the towns, and unless the Post Office Department or somebody down in the Post Office Department has vision enough to see that situation and adopt a reasonable charge for boxes in these villages, you will drive the people in these towns to have their mail delivered at a cost of over $30,000,000, and you will lose the box rent besides, whereas if the department will make a small or nominal charge for box rent, most of these small towns would prefer to go to the post office for their mail, and unless this is done quickly you are going to have a cost of over $30,000,000 saddled on you when the people would prefer another method.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Has the gentleman ever come across an instance where this village delivery has been imposed on the people of a village without their consent?

Mr. HULL. You will not, and every one of them will want it as long as you tax them for the privilege of going to the local post office many times what they ought to pay. I have been a postmaster in a small town, and I know the situation.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not know of a case where it has been imposed upon the people where the people did not want it.

Mr. BARKLEY. What size of a town does the gentleman from Iowa refer to?

Mr. HULL. Towns of 1,000 to 3,000 population. I was postmaster in a small town. I had to buy the old outfit. It was a piece of junk. It did not cost me much. The inspector who came to the town wanted me to double the box rent on the people of that town. I called his attention to the fact that the Post Office Department did not own that outfit. At first I succeeded in preventing an increased box rent, but finally they raised the rent, so that the people had to pay for the entire outfit twice over every three months.

Mr. BARKLEY. When the gentleman refers to the tax he means the box rent?

Mr. HULL. Yes. When I refer to the tax I refer to the box rent. The Government was getting in one quarter three times the value of the outfit. If you charge a town $1,000 box rent per year to get their mail it is a tax on that town, and if you deliver the mail free to a near-by town then the people that are charged $1,000 will prefer free delivery. Everybody except a bureau of dumbheads in the Post Office Department can understand this proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not always optional whether a person shall have a post-office box or not?

Mr. HULL. No; it is not. There is not a small city in this country that could throw its mail into the general delivery and give the people their mail within a week. This is a matter of clerical help which the Government can not afford to furnish.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is a question of the service.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. SLEMP] to make a little plainer for our record and for our information what I understand to be the fact. There are 86 of these village delivery offices now that are entitled to become city delivery offices. If we should fail to keep up the village delivery system, they would be forced to go into city delivery offices, and that, so far as they are concerned, would increase considerably the cost.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it would put on four or five carriers where they have two now, and receive first $1,400 and then $1,800 where we pay about $1,050 now.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to say that so far as my experience goes I am compelled to differ from my colleague from Iowa [Mr. HULL] as to the appreciation which the people of these towns of from 1,500 to 2,000 inhabitants show with regard to this service. If the gentleman had seen the petitions which have come to me and the letters that have been written to me within the last few days because of the fact that they had heard of the recommendation of the Postmaster General, I am quite sure that the gentleman would believe that they really appreciate the service that they are now receiving.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. I do not doubt the appreciation of the people for this service. There is no question about it, and wherever it is established they will appreciate it more and more, but there are thousands of towns in this country to-day that do not want the service. I contend that if they do not want the service they ought to be privileged to go to the local post office and get their mail and not be taxed an excessive amount for the privilege in the way of box rent.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand, of course, that no village that now has not the service will be forced to accept it. It will be necessary for them to make application and petition for it and to arrange to receive the service. So no town will have this service forced upon it under any circumstances. If the towns do not want the service, the question whether they shall or shall not pay box rent is entirely separate from the consideration of this question, as I see it.

Mr. MANN. I should like to make one inquiry. It seems anomalous for the Committee on Appropriations to report an item like this where no amount is limited by law, and to accompany the report with an amendment to increase the amount reported. It is so much easier to say $1,500,000, and print it in the bill as reported to the House, that I think some explanation is due to the House as to why you report a bill with one hand and with the other offer an amendment to increase it.

Mr. SLEMP. I will say to the gentleman that the reduction made in the estimates was made by the Bureau of the Budget; that the Post Office Department originally submitted an estimate for $1,500,000 for this service; that the Budget officer reduced it to $1,300,000, and the subcommittee, as well as the Committee on Appropriations, have rather gone on the theory that the Budget people had presented a maximum estimate to Congress, and we thought that inasmuch as this was going against the recommendation of the Budget officer it ought to be submitted to the House, to adopt the recommendation if it saw fit.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it would have been submitted to the House itself if the original appropriation suggested of $1,500,000 had been carried. It only illustrates after all the beating of the devil around the stump. There has been an idea on the part of many people in the country that Congress should have no right to increase an appropriation over the amount suggested by the Director of the Budget, and should have no right to make any appropriation which was not recommended by him. Now, the distinguished Committee on Appropriations, desiring to keep in line with this reform sentiment—without much basis of reform—have reported a bill which did not increase the amount recommended by the Director of the Budget, but they slip in an amendment at the same time which does increase it—which only shows how ridiculous the whole proposition is. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. I move to strike out the last word. I want to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP]. If I understand the appropriation that is carried in the bill, of $1,300,000, would it be sufficient to maintain the service without expansion for the next fiscal year?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. And that if this additional appropriation of $200,000 is granted, it means a further expansion of the service?

Mr. SLEMP. That is correct.

Mr. TILSON. What will become of the expense of the 86 cities that are referred to if they are elevated to the free carrier service?

Mr. SLEMP. It is not proposed to elevate them, as I understand it. I want to make it clear that the Post Office Department in its efforts to economize does not propose to transfer them next year.

Mr. TILSON. Is there an appropriation carried to take care of them if they should be transferred?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The preceding item.

Mr. TILSON. So that that much will be saved out of this appropriation if they are not transferred?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The business of the Government is so large that a little item of $200,000 seems so inconsequential that we pass right over it, and the tendency among those who are to receive benefits to accept them is so great that we often permit ourselves to pursue an erroneous policy. Now, I live in one of these villages. I have three or four towns in my district that are seeking this delivery, and yet candor compels me to say that there is nothing more savoring of luxury and less of necessity than this. In the town in which I live and in which I get my mail by city or village delivery I do not even have a box. We go to the post office and get our mail. Why? For many reasons. We are closer to the post office than the average farmer is to his mail box. Besides, it is a social opportunity to go to the post office. We rather like to gather there with the boys and girls at mail time to get the mail. I know that we do not need it, and therefore, although I will be a beneficiary of it, as I said in the outset, candor compels me to say that there is no necessity for it in my district, and I think the same is true over the entire country. [Applause.]

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. The increase of appropriations in this bill does not affect conditions as they now exist. As I understand it, only $1,200,000 is to be expended this year.

Mr. SLEMP. One million two hundred and thirteen thousand.

Mr. DOWELL. And $1,500,000 has been appropriated for this next year.

Mr. SLEMP. That is correct.

Mr. DOWELL. Irrespective of this bill the department has authority to continue the extension during the existing fiscal year.

Mr. SLEMP. The gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the recommendation of the Postmaster General on this subject in his report be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DUNBAR. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the chairman of the Appropriations Committee if the recommendation of the Postmaster General is placed in the RECORD, the testimony before your committee is placed in the RECORD, if that will not wrongfully state his attitude to-day on the village delivery?

Mr. MADDEN. It will, because he has already withdrawn it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Detroit River postal service, $14,400.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I am anxious to help the committee save money. We are all anxious to save money, and with the consent of the committee I want to say a few words, chiefly relating to the city of Boston, because I know more about the situation there, in relation to the rentals being paid by the Veterans' Bureau for its 14 branches. In Boston they have taken over two floors of a huge building. Twice it has had tenants for the whole building, both of whom failed, and the building remained vacant for a long time. I happen to know about the circumstances, because it was first occupied by the Siegel Co., and I was one of the trustees in bankruptcy of that concern. The building was then put under the hammer, I believe, and bid in by the mortgagee. I do not know who owns it now, but I do know that the rental for the two floors of that building is now being paid at the rate of $154,000 per year. I understand that in Ohio some of the Representatives on this floor heard that an exorbitant rental was to be paid, or had been agreed to be paid, for district No. 7 headquarters, and they protested against it, and it was reduced by two-thirds. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio if that is not so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The original arrangement was something like $120,000. Objection was made to paying such an enormous rent, and quarters were procured in another building, as I remember, for about $40,000.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I want to put in the rentals that are paid in the different cities. They are as follows:

Boston, Mass	$154,500.00
New York, N. Y	166,430.00
Philadelphia, Pa	135,300.00
Atlanta, Ga	18,000.00
New Orleans, La	46,552.00
Cincinnati, Ohio	44,152.58
Chicago, Ill	191,500.00
St. Louis, Mo	30,202.00
Minneapolis, Minn	63,732.00
Denver, Colo	54,989.96
San Francisco, Calif	56,900.00
Seattle, Wash	46,783.00
Dallas, Tex	36,750.00
Total yearly rent (14 offices)	1,045,791.54

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Now will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I suggest that the gentleman also with his figures give the floor space so as to enable the House to judge of the relativity of these rents.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I shall be glad to add the floor space, but so far as the city of Boston is concerned the floor rent is not material, because in that case there was a building that has been practically going begging, and you can not compare it with what is paid per foot in the neighborhood.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think that all of the rents are too high.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. That is my point, and all I wanted to do was to call it to the attention of the House. We are all anxious to save money. We do not want this bureau to function the way its predecessor did.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand it, the gentleman thinks that the necessary quarters in his city—and I presume he is acquainted with the rents there—under the circumstances could be obtained for a considerably less sum.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I do. Besides the Government has some buildings there.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not in use?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Not in use, as I understand it. There is no reason why they can not at least get bids, and there is no reason why this bureau should be in the heart of the business section of Boston or in the most expensive buildings. I want to see this money go to the soldiers and not to these people who have buildings to rent.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman from Massachusetts states that it is proposed to pay $154,500 for two floors of this building in Boston to which he refers.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. What did the entire building rent for when it was rented?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I do not remember. It must be 12 years or more ago that I had to do with it. All I want to do here is to get the committee to look into the matter.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Where is this building in Boston?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. It used to be called the Siegel Building. It do not know who owns it now. It is on the corner of Washington and Essex Streets.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is a very important business district?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And there is no necessity whatever for having the bureau at that point in the center of the business district?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Not in the least.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I wonder if the gentleman is of the same opinion that I am with respect to the regional directors relative to the scattering of the records of the Veterans' Bureau all over the United States. I think we might as well acknowledge now as six months or a year from now——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. He has just now come to the important part.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I am willing to have my time extended, but I did not mean to interfere with the passage of this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I think we ought to get through with the bill. We are anxious to get through with this bill this afternoon, so that the House may adjourn over until Monday.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for five minutes?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, at the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], I append as a part of my remarks the following table:

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of foreign mails by steamship, aircraft, or otherwise, $6,500,000: Provided, That not to exceed $150,000 of this sum may be expended for carrying foreign mail by aircraft.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is an item for carrying foreign mail by aircraft, is it not?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; from Seattle to Vancouver. They have to carry the mail there by air in order to make the connections with the steamers.

Mr. WINGO. Is that recommended by the Postmaster General?

Mr. MADDEN. That has been carried for some time.

Mr. SLEMP. That is recommended by the department.

Mr. WINGO. Has it the approval of the Postmaster General?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Does the committee approve of it?

Mr. SLEMP. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me, although you may say I am provincial, that the village delivery of mail is more important than the transfer by aircraft of foreign mail. You can not deliver the village mail by aircraft, and yet the Republican Postmaster General approves this aircraft proposition for carrying foreign mail. We find on pages 34 and 35 of his report a very condemnatory statement with respect to the village delivery service. He there states:

This service (village delivery) was first authorized as "experimental" in 1913, with an appropriation of $100,000.

That is $50,000 less than the amount you spend for the delivery of foreign mail by aircraft. It may be of interest to know just exactly what the Postmaster General, a leading member of our Republican millionaire Cabinet, has to say about this matter of village delivery service.

Under the subtitle "Village Delivery Service," in the annual report of the Republican Postmaster General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, he condemns village delivery mail service in the following language:

VILLAGE DELIVERY SERVICE.

This service was first authorized as "experimental" in 1913, with an appropriation of $100,000. It was designed to provide for the delivery of mail in communities not covered by either city or rural delivery service.

After the first year of its experiment its discontinuance was recommended on the ground that its ultimate extension to all offices of the second class with receipts below $10,000 per annum, and to all third-class offices, would involve an annual cost of $10,000,000. At that time the average cost per office was about $1,000 per annum. This has been increased to more than $1,200, which would bring the prospective cost of village delivery service to approximately $13,000,000 should it be established at all third-class offices, which number increased 2,259 during the past year.

Congress having the following year continued the appropriation for village delivery service, the department fixed a minimum of $5,000 gross annual receipts for offices at which such service would be established on the ground that at smaller offices the expense would not be warranted, and this rule has since been followed with but few exceptions. There must also be at least 1,500 people within the limits to be served by the carrier.

The appropriation has been increased from year to year until at present it is $1,500,000, while the salaries of carriers have been increased for $600 in 1913 to $1,200, the present maximum. Village delivery has been inaugurated at 749 offices with 1,109 carriers, as follows:

	Offices.	Carriers.
Second-class offices	265	427
Third-class offices	484	682
Total	749	1,109

In view of the small size of these towns and the postal conditions present, it is believed that the expenditure of public funds is not warranted by the benefits received. As a general rule, the dwellings in towns of this character are clustered around the business section, which is concentrated within a space of one or two blocks. No patron, therefore, has any considerable distance to travel for his mail, and the bulk of the mail is for the business houses, which are within a few steps of the post office. Some member of practically every family has occasion to visit the business section, near the post office, one or more times daily, and their mail can thus be obtained without inconvenience or a special trip for that purpose. Furthermore, patrons residing farthest from the office who would naturally receive the greatest benefits from delivery service are almost invariably excluded therefrom because of the lack of necessary improvements, such as sidewalks, crosswalks, street sign, etc.

The original purpose of delivery service was to relieve congestion in post-office lobbies, which condition does not exist in towns and villages where village delivery may be established, and to obviate the necessity of patrons traveling long distances for their mail, which necessity is not overcome by that service.

The Congress should give consideration to these facts and determine whether the appropriation for this service should not be discontinued.

In other words, he is perfectly willing to look after the cities and have frequent deliveries of mail each day in the great cities in that part of the country which the Republican chairman of this great committee boasts runs the Government. He, this Republican Postmaster General, is perfectly willing to provide for four or five or six deliveries a day in the great cities like Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, and New York, but he would take away delivery service in the towns and small cities whose citizens are served by village delivery. Those small-town folks, in his opinion, are not very important anyway, and why, he asks, give them one or two deliveries of mail a day? Oh, no; that would never do; we must save that money for carrying this foreign mail by aircraft, and for the purpose of delivering mail four to six times a day to men in these great cities.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I fear the gentleman missed the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT], who lives in one of these villages and who referred to this as a pure luxury, and put forth the advantages of the post office as a meeting place for society.

Mr. WINGO. No. That only shows the enervating effect of associating with the distinguished gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. LONGWORTH]. I am doing what I am doing deliberately, and I think the gentleman from Ohio is not deceived as to what my purpose is at the present time in occupying the floor for a few moments. Having accomplished that object, and finding my time is not up, I thought I would provoke something from my genial friend from Ohio. The point is this: The administration, with its millionaire Cabinet spending thousands upon thousands of dollars to help the faithful and for keeping them in office, regardless of the methods used, seems to have very little use for these people who live in villages and small towns throughout the country, and does not want to continue the mail service extended to them by the last Democratic administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of limited indemnity for the injury or loss of pieces of domestic registered matter, insured and collect-on-delivery mail, $4,365,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the chairman of the committee whether this amount is increasing very much or not?

Mr. SLEMP. No, sir; it is not. I will say that we get about $16,000,000 of revenue out of that, and the statement of the department was that the work was largely due to pilfering and was not due to inefficient handling of mail, or bad handling, or bad wrapping, or anything of that kind. A little more careful watching has a tendency to reduce that.

Mr. FESS. Have we any estimate at all of what amount of value is transported through the mails in a year?

Mr. SLEMP. We have that in the Postmaster General's report. I think it is rather fairly full on that. This item is infinitesimally small in comparison with the business that is done.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman state as to this business, whether it is increasing rapidly or not? I mean the insuring of mail packages?

Mr. SLEMP. It is increasing as the packages and the number of pieces increase.

Mr. TILSON. As a matter of fact, it is a net source of revenue to the Government?

Mr. SLEMP. The office received $1,600,000 in 1917 and $6,218,000 in 1921. The cases adjusted were 39,000 then, and they went from that to 368,000. The whole statement of that can be found in the hearings on page 304.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman permit a question for information?

Mr. SLEMP. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. In line 19 there is a reference to insured mail. Is there any class of mail other than the parcel post mail that is the subject of insurance?

Mr. SLEMP. You can register or insure any mail.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Can you insure first-class mail?

Mr. SLEMP. I am not sure of that.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Why I ask is——

Mr. STEENERSON. As my information goes, there is no insurance on first-class mail. That insurance is largely done by private companies.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. There is no insurance by the Post Office Department on any mail other than parcel-post mail? I did not hear the gentleman's answer.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is a limit of $50 of loss on registered mail. That is somewhat in the nature of insurance. But the law in regard to insurance is simply in regard to parcel-post mail.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, Chairman of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9859, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SLEMP, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. STEENERSON. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the REC-ORD on the bill just passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. ROUSE. And I make the same request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Richard Dove, Sixty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the question of American valuation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Are those the gentleman's own remarks, or is it some printed statement?

Mr. BOX. They are his own remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SOLDIER MEMORIALS.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman withhold that just a minute?

Mr. SLEMP. I will.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating a resolution, which covers one typewritten page, of the Ohio Archæological and Historical Society on the subject of Ohio soldiers' memorials.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the resolution of the association referred to, on soldiers' memorials. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the resolution referred to:

At a meeting of the board of trustees of the Ohio State Archæological and Historical Society, following the annual meeting of the society on October 12, 1921, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That immediate steps be taken with the funds now in possession of the society to begin the erection of a World War Memorial Annex to the society building in memory of the soldiers of Ohio who served in the World War, for the purpose of preserving all records and references, muster rolls, maps, news clippings, and papers relating to the World War, particularly Ohio's part therein, in such manner as to make them immediately available to the soldiers of Ohio, and for the exhibition of the numerous relics and memorials of that great combat in which Ohio soldiers so worthily participated.

Be it further resolved, That the trustees of the Ohio State Archæological and Historical Society respectfully invite attention to the manner in which Sandusky County, Ohio, has memorialized her heroic dead of the World War by the construction, through the property of the trustee for Spiegel Grove, of the Soldiers' Memorial Parkway, of Sandusky County, consisting of a boulevard 100 feet in width with 2 rows of buckeye trees, the insignia of the Thirty-seventh, or Ohio, Division, placed 35 feet apart, to which are affixed enameled metallic tree labels 4 by 8 inches, containing the name, organization, place of death, and date of death of each soldier. On either side of the 50-foot lobe two 14-foot paved drives have been constructed, while in the center of the parkway an ellipse 60 by 110 feet in diameter has been constructed, in which has been planted a mammoth Red Cross in flowers with flower insignias of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, the Salvation Army, and the Jewish Welfare have been placed in the four sections of the Red Cross, while a beautiful flag pole occupies the center. In addition to the Soldiers' Memorial Parkway there has been placed on the Hayes Memorial Building, in the Spiegel Grove State Park, a beautiful tablet containing the names of each soldier of Sandusky County who died in the service of his country. This mode of memorializing Ohio's dead at the county seat of each county is respectfully recommended to each county in Ohio.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, January 16, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7077) to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 37) providing for the printing of 50,000 additional copies of the report of the Joint Committee of Agricultural Inquiry, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, last week when the Newberry case was before the Senate the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] announced a pair between the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. A few minutes previous to that announcement I had received information from Mr. Keller, who represents the Democratic side in reference to pairs, that we had received a notice from the secretary of Senator WATSON to the effect that Senator WATSON did not desire to be paired in the case. The Washington Herald of this morning contains an article which I desire to have the Secretary read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

FRIENDS SAY RUSE CANCELED VOTE FOR NEWBERRY—WATSON DENIES HE HAD AUTHORIZED REPUDIATION OF PAIR WITH NORBECK.

Friends of Senator NEWBERRY are aroused over discovery of what they believe were dishonest tactics resorted to in the effort to unseat the Michigan Senator last week.

When the voting began Senator CURTIS, the Republican whip, announced the pairing of Senator WATSON, of Georgia, for seating, with Senator NORBECK, of South Dakota, for unseating NEWBERRY. WATSON was absent, and NORBECK withheld his vote at first. Senator TOWNSEND, of Michigan, had informed Senator CURTIS he had the authority of WATSON to pair the Georgian in favor of NEWBERRY.

Before the result was announced Senator UNDERWOOD, the Democratic leader, informed Senator CURTIS that WATSON'S secretary had sent word to cancel the pair. Senator CURTIS announced the cancellation, and NORBECK voted against NEWBERRY.

Senator WATSON stated yesterday that neither he nor his secretary had authorized cancellation of the pair, and intimated he would ask for an investigation. Senator UNDERWOOD says the message to cancel came by telephone, but he had believed it genuine.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I am not criticizing my friends on the other side of the Chamber at all about their making the pair; but this question of the integrity of pairs is a very important thing for the Senate, and a scurrilous charge of this kind can not be allowed to go by uncontradicted without impairing the whole organization of the Senate.

I did not raise this question originally on the floor of the Senate. I merely suggested to the Senator who made the pair that I had information that the Senator involved—and it was a personal matter to the Senator—did not desire the pair made. Since this paper was published I have conferred with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] in reference to the matter, and he has assured me—and the Senator is now on the floor of the Senate—that the statement I made that he did not desire the pair made was correct, and that I had authority to make the statement that no pair should be made in his name.

I say that without criticism of the Senators who made the pair, because I know they made the offer in all good faith. I am not criticizing them at all; but I can not allow a newspaper to publish without contradiction a scurrilous statement in reference to the pairs of the Senate that is not warranted by the truth and the facts in the matter.

Of course I did not see the Senator from Georgia at the time I stated that he did not desire a pair made. It came to me as a message; but it was my duty, as leader, to represent the Senators on this side, and I was sure a mistake was being made, and I only put it on that ground. There is no reflection on the Senator who announced the pair, but the Senate can not allow the statement to be made that improper methods were used to cancel a pair.

I now state with authority that I had a message from the Senator from Georgia that he was not paired in the case, and he is here on the floor to hear my statement. So with that contradiction, showing that I did have the authority to do what I did, I hope this statement will go into that basket of untruths that sometimes creep into the public press.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will allow me to make a brief statement, I think a few simple words of truth will clear up the whole matter.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the facts are these: On one day of last week—I think last Thursday morning—something after 9 o'clock, on my way to the office preparatory to going to the committee room where the soldier investigation has been under way, I passed the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who was standing at the elevator on the lower floor waiting to go up to his floor. I merely remarked to him that I supposed I would have to be paired on the case and went by. I spent the whole morning in the committee room where the soldier investigation was going on, and afterwards returned to my own room in the George Washington Inn for luncheon with my wife. After the luncheon I did not feel disposed to return to the Senate. I had work that would occupy me; I was not feeling well, and I exercised my privilege to remain indoors. During the afternoon I told one of my clerks, Mr. Edmondston, to come to the pairing clerk, Mr. Keller, and to tell him that I did not care to have my vote paired, supposing, of course, that that would be communicated to the Senator from Michigan.

The Senator was quite honest, I am sure, in supposing that I had authorized him to pair me, but I really did not go to that extent. I merely remarked that I might have to pair. Afterwards I decided not to pair, and that is all there is to it.

In the paper to which reference has been made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] it is stated:

Senator WATSON stated yesterday that neither he nor his secretary had authorized cancellation of the pair, and intimated he would ask for an investigation.

Mr. President, that statement is absolutely unfounded. I spoke to nobody about the pair yesterday or the day before. I made no such statement as this at any time. On the contrary, the statement I have made as to what I said in passing to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] on the way to my office, and what I afterwards decided to do at my room are the absolute and the whole truth about it; and that explains the entire situation as I see it.

While I am on my feet, Mr. President, I beg the Senate to allow me to correct another statement that is in this same paper, the Washington Herald of this morning. It is stated that I, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], were on the stage at the meeting at the house of the ex-President yesterday afternoon. That statement is not true. I was at my rooms. I had no knowledge that such a meeting was to be had. I was not invited there. I could not with propriety have accepted such an invitation had I received it. Therefore, both these statements in reference to myself are untrue.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I understood the situation practically as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] has stated it. He brought the matter up to me as I stood by the elevator, saying, as I remember the terms, "You will have to pair me, as I fear I can not get there; our committee is in session." I did not think about it at the time; but when we got here and the question was brought up, I called the office of the Senator, and the clerk said the Senator was not there; he did not know what he wanted. I said to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] exactly what I am saying now to the Senate. I said then: "I do not know that the Senator meant to authorize me to pair him, although he used the words, 'I fear you will have to pair me on this vote,' and I tried to find out"; and I stated to the Senator from Kansas exactly the language I am using now in reference to that matter, and the pair was made.

I regret exceedingly that anything was printed in the newspaper which would reflect either upon the Senator from Alabama or upon the Senator from Georgia. I never had any suspicions about the matter. When the word came to me from the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that he had received word from the Senator from Georgia that he did not want to pair, I immediately insisted that the pair should be withdrawn. I never thought there was any unworthy motive or anything involved in it except that the Senator from Georgia had made up his mind that he did not want to be paired on this question, as he had a right to make it up, and I never questioned his integrity or his honesty or that of anybody else in this matter.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, what I know about this matter bears out precisely what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has said. When he told me that he had information that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] did not care to be paired I took the precaution, because he himself had not seen the Senator from Georgia, to inquire as to what the situation was. I personally talked with the secretary of the Senator from Georgia—I think his name is Mr. Edmonston, a tall man with reddish hair, who came to me by the courtesy of Mr. Keller—and he at once told me frankly that the Senator from Georgia said that he did not care to be paired. That was after the pair had been announced and after the pair had been canceled. It bears out exactly what the Senator from Alabama has said.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 7077) to increase the force and salaries in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Patents.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK BUILDING IN NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain facts concerning the Federal reserve bank building in New York. I notice that there have been several speeches made on the subject, and in order that full information may be had with reference to this building I ask that these facts may be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

THE BANK BUILDING OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANK OF NEW YORK—VOLUME OF THE BANK'S BUSINESS.

The Federal Reserve Bank of New York is the largest bank in the country in resources, in size of its staff, and in daily turnover. It does about one-third of the entire transactions of the Federal reserve system. Its present staff is 36 officers and 2,715 clerks, exclusive of the Buffalo branch. The volume of its operations for 1920 was as follows:

Discounts and advances, 180,462 items aggregating $50,539,428,847.

Acceptances purchased for New York and other Federal reserve banks, 106,237 items aggregating $2,428,000,000.

Federal reserve notes and other paper money handled and counted, 558,397,400 pieces aggregating $2,291,785,688.

Shipments of currency and coin, 67,405 shipments.

Checks collected, 87,036,424 items aggregating $55,325,112,827.

Notes and drafts collected, 563,814 items aggregating $1,994,713,245.

Telegraphic transfers of funds, 147,302 transfers aggregating $17,021,509,734.

Balances settled through gold settlement fund, $48,840,900,000.

United States Government checks and warrants paid 10,712,243 items aggregating $2,437,759,148.

Government bond department transactions, 47,797,417 pieces aggregating $6,955,101,000.

Total certificates of indebtedness department transactions, including issues and redemptions, $4,897,841,000.

Securities handled in custody for United States Treasury and member banks, $100,759,404,785.

The cost of operating departments handling United States Government transactions is about $800,000 per annum, a large part of which used to be paid by the Treasury, but since July 1, 1921, it is all absorbed by the bank. This does not include the cost of printing, issuing, and redeeming Federal reserve notes which are an obligation of the United States of America and a necessary element in our circulation, replacing in part the gold certificates which the Government formerly printed, issued, and redeemed. The cost to the bank of printing, issuing, and redeeming Federal reserve notes in 1921 was over $2,000,000.

UNSATISFACTORY OPERATING CONDITIONS NECESSITATE BUILDING.

The conditions under which this vast volume of work is carried on are unsafe, unhealthy, an uneconomical. The main offices of the bank are scattered about in eight floors of the Equitable Building. In addition 561 employees are housed in the annex building four blocks away and 178 in the Subtreasury Building.

Safety: The bank holds about $5,000,000,000 in cash and securities, stored in 11 vaults located in 5 separate buildings. Some of these vaults do not afford sufficient protection, but no others are available. The average value of cash and securities withdrawn and replaced in the various scattered vaults daily is cash $180,000,000, securities $1,940,000,000. A daily average of 368 transfers of cash and securities are made through the streets and the corridors of office buildings at great risk of loss.

Health: The health and morale of the staff is in constant danger through overcrowding and poor ventilation. The space per person is considerably below the proper requirements. The Equitable Building is designed for offices and not for use in large areas such as bank uses and which require mechanical ventilation.

Economy: These scattered and crowded conditions make economy of operation impossible. Two thousand working days per year are lost in distributing cash and securities from vault to various floors in Equitable Building. Three hundred and sixty-eight visits per month to vaults outside Equitable Building consume 2,366 work days per year. The auditing department, located several blocks away, makes 57 trips per day to the Equitable Building, equivalent to 814 working days per year. The public and the member banks are greatly inconvenienced by having to call at the various floors of the Equitable Building, the Subtreasury, and the Annex Building. During the busiest periods 10,000 people in a single day visited the Government bond department of the bank.

The directors have an immeasurable responsibility to the bank's stockholders—that is, member banks—to the Treasury, and to the public, not only to provide means to conduct these huge operations safely and expeditiously but to erect a building providing every precaution for the safeguard of the vast amount of securities and cash entrusted to them. If the Treasury were gutted, Congress would have to provide for recoupment, but if any of the many threats to blow up or rob the Federal reserve bank were by any chance attempted and executed, the loss would have to be met out of the bank's own capital or resources, for which the directors, and not Congress, are responsible. Appreciating that responsibility, they are impelled by every consideration of duty and good sense to provide appropriate quarters for the bank's employees and adequate and safe space for the bank's immense assets. They would have failed in both duty and good sense had they not selected a location adaptable to the uses for which the bank exists or had they not provided for a building sufficiently large to meet not only the bank's present needs but reasonable future expansion. The present plans provide for a possible expansion of from 50 to 75 per cent, a not unreasonable allowance in view of the past rapid growth in the business of the bank and the business of the New York district. Until needed, the space provided for expansion will be available for renting, just as in any other private banking building. It has been found by experience that banks in New York City and elsewhere which have built without similar precautions have been forced later to provide additional buildings or space elsewhere at relatively heavy expense and inconvenience. In fact, two Federal reserve banks which have constructed their own buildings have already found it necessary to provide additional buildings.

The fact that the amount of loans made by the Federal reserve bank may be reduced in dollars does not of itself mean any corresponding reduction in the amount of services rendered to the member banks, to the Government, and to the public in the other operating departments of the bank. This is shown by the fact that though our loans have been reduced from a high point of $1,038,000,000, in November, 1920, to $156,000,000 at present, nevertheless the work of the check department, for instance, the largest department of the bank, with 589 employees, has quite steadily increased since its organization to what is now about the maximum. That is also true of other large departments of the bank. (For increase in volume of business of bank see pp. 38–45, inclusive, of S. Doc. No. 75, 67th Cong., 1st sess.) While the volume of business of the discount division, the division which actually negotiates the loans of the bank, has decreased in dollars, as stated above, nevertheless, that division employed only 86 employees when operating at its maximum, so that the decrease in the number of its employees to the present number of 49, which is only 1.8 per cent of the total number of employees of the bank, represents a relatively small decrease in the total volume of work of the bank. In fact, the number of pieces actually handled by this division showed only a small decrease from 180,462 in 1920 to 136,878 in 1921, further evidence that even a great decrease in the dollar value of the bank's loans makes only a relatively slight difference in the volume of work of even this division.

Finally, there being no question as to the necessity for the building, there could be no better time for construction than on a falling market for both labor and materials, the general contract being such as to give the bank the benefit of such falling costs. It will be shown later how the bank has already profited greatly because of these facts.

THE SITE.

To purchase a site a real estate committee was created in 1918, consisting of three directors and the governor of the bank.

Acting on expert advice, the property bounded by Liberty and Nassau Streets and Maiden Lane, only two blocks from the United States Subtreasury, was gradually bought in 1918 and 1919 at the low figure of $4,797,381.72, at a time when real estate was greatly depressed. The area of the plat is 45,950 square feet and the price $104 per square foot. A piece of land situated across the street from the bank property recently sold at double the price per square foot. There was no unimproved property available; but, fortunately, a great part of the existing improvements were poor. They were appraised at $1,703,831.72, and have been charged off, reducing the book value of the site to $3,094,050.

THE BUILDING.

Organization: A building committee of five directors and the governor, with a deputy governor as its executive, controls all policies, plans, and proposals, and the letting of contracts.

Architects: In September, 1918, a consulting architect, employed jointly by the bank and the Federal Reserve Board, after studying the organization of the bank and its operations, prepared a plan under which Messrs. York & Sawyer, of New York, were chosen in 1919 architects for the building. The terms of the competition provided for the architects the usual fee adopted by the American Institute of Architects, of 6 per cent of the completed cost of the building. To this was added 1½ per cent upon that portion of the building built under the supervision of special engineers, from which the architect would pay all engineering fees.

On the basis of the estimated cost of the building in March, 1921, the architects would receive a fee of $1,106,000, of which about $270,000 would go to the vault, heating and ventilating, and foundation engineers.

The fee of 6 per cent paid to the architects is at the same rate as that which the same architects recently received from the Treasury for building the assay office in New York City.

The fees to be paid in the case of the Federal Reserve Bank Building represent a period of employment of about five years and cover the services of their staff in designing and superintending the work.

General contractor: The firm of Marc Eidlitz & Son (Inc.) was chosen by the directors because of their qualifications to do work of the sort required, demonstrated over a period of many years in building in New York City. Their fee is on the basis of 5 per cent of the first $6,000,000 spent, 4 per cent of the next $3,000,000, and 3 per cent of any expenditure above $9,000,000. In no case is their fee to exceed $500,000. This figure is lower than the customary one for work of this character.

Under this contract the firm puts its large staff at the disposal of the bank, undertakes the management and superintendence of the job, securing the widest competition in all subcontracts and in the purchase of all supplies, building materials, and tools.

Foundations: The Foundation Co., of New York, is doing its work at cost, plus a fixed fee of $140,000. The cost upon which this fee was based was the first estimated cost of $1,838,000. The fee is approximately 8 per cent of this cost and has been separated by the subcontractor into two parts, 3½ per cent for the overhead and 4½ per cent for the profit. It is common practice among subcontractors to charge considerably more than this for overhead and profit.

The foundation work is the biggest job of the kind ever undertaken in New York, the excavation going down 90 feet below the street level. The risk to surrounding property is very great. The company was chosen because of the confidence of the directors in their ability to do a thorough and workmanlike job within a minimum of risk. As in the case of the general contractor, wide competition is secured in the purchase of all supplies, building materials, and tools.

Estimated cost of the building: The estimate of $17,990,347 prepared in March, 1921, was an outside cost estimate for the entire building and equipment, except vault equipment. That it was an outside allowance is indicated by the fact that on wrecking, steel, stonework, boilers, coal-handling device, foundations, and vault walls, the seven items as to which figures are available, there is a saving over the figures of the March budget for these items of 23 per cent. Further substantial savings on 61 other items, as to which no figures are available yet, is reasonably assured in view of the falling market.

For the wall construction of the security vaults, which will be the largest and most secure ever constructed in the United States, an allowance of $1,003,600 was originally made. As a result of experiments conducted by the Federal Reserve Board and the Bureau of Standards vault walls will be constructed many times as strong as any now in use, at an estimated cost of $500,000, a saving of $503,600.

The building is being erected in a time of falling prices, and under the contracts every decline in price or freight accrues to the bank.

NATURE OF THE BUILDING.

The building is designed to meet the particular needs of the Federal reserve bank. It is 15 stories high above the street and 5 stories below the street for vaults and machinery. Except for the vaults it is a commercial type of building and is a real asset of the bank. Such floors as the bank may at any time not need to occupy are suitable for renting.

Exterior: The design for the exterior of the bank is conspicuous for its simplicity. All ornament has been omitted. The architects expect to obtain a good result through well-studied proportion of openings and a careful study of stone jointing. The material for the exterior, some of which has already been cut, is selected from the limestone quarries of Indiana and a sandstone quarry in Ohio. For the most part the selection is from that part of the output which, because of color markings, the quarrymen usually consider worthless, as there has heretofore been no market for it. The architects visited the quarries and, realizing that the grained, colored, and mottled limestone was not only cheap but was well adapted to add interest to a wall surface already devoid of ornament, they recommended to the building committee that this grade of stone be used. A saving of $1,004,860 under the budget allowance for stone was realized, partly because of the selection of a stone not in general demand but chiefly through the efforts of the architects in cooperation with the general contractor to reduce the quantity of stone to a minimum.

Interior finish: The intention is to finish this building for work and not for show. A reading of the memorandum specifications prepared in March, 1921, at the time the budget was prepared, discloses a finish which in a very large part is no more elaborate than the degree of finish in an ordinary commercial loft building. If these specifications were to be offered to a private banking corporation for its use in the construction of a building, they would prove to be inadequate and lacking in the many niceties which are usually considered necessary for a high-grade banking institution. The amount of marble called for in the public halls throughout the building is considerably less than is usually installed in an ordinary office building built for investment. On many of the floors the public halls exist only in the elevator corridors, the working quarters of the bank opening quite directly from these corridors. Thus the cost of long marble-wainscoted corridors, a feature of many commercial office buildings, is not incurred in this special type of building.

In certain spaces, such as the employees' entrance hall and the security corridors in the basements, the walls will be covered to a height of 4 feet, and in some cases 5 feet, with steel wainscoting. Similar spaces in other buildings usually contain marble wainscots.

Throughout the building, in basements and on typical working floors, most of the spaces will have cement floors, slate bases, and plastered walls. The bank has no intention of carrying this economical treatment so far as to work injury to the building. Where durable, easily cleaned material is required on walls or columns, in the public spaces of the first and second floors, a stone or marble treatment will be carried out, though the extent of this work has not yet been determined.

The officers' rooms are to be finished no more elaborately than the rooms rented to tenants in the Equitable Building, where the bank is now installed, walls and ceilings to be finished in plain plaster.

On the three upper floors, considerably smaller than the area occupied by a typical working floor, are to be installed certain departments designed to promote the efficiency and the well-being of the employees. Here will be found a medical department; two cafeterias, one for men and one for women, where employees serve themselves and pay for their lunch; rest rooms, indispensably necessary in the employment of large numbers of female employees; a small gymnasium; and an assembly room, 4,600 square feet, susceptible of being cut up into classrooms, containing space on the floor for about 650 persons, and in a gallery for about 350 additional. The inclusion of these features in the building was decided upon after a careful survey of the business and industrial world to ascertain the accepted practice in modern business organizations concerning the safeguarding of the health of the employee and the building up of a morale as the result of fair treatment. In all of these spaces the plan is to use plain, plastered walls and ceilings, with slate bases, wood chair rails, and picture molding (where required), and cement floors. In the cafeteria the floor is to be of terazzo, a material commonly used in Child's restaurants, and so specified because it is readily cleaned and is nonabsorbent.

Vaults: The vaults are all underground, three stories high, and the strongest in the world. They are large enough to provide for an immense amount of securities and cash, which now have to be carried in 11 different vaults, located in 5 different buildings, because of the lack of adequate space.

FRANCHISE TAX.

It should be borne in mind, in considering building operations, that the Federal reserve banks in acquiring building sites and constructing bank buildings are making capital expenditures, and consequently these operations do not diminish in any way the amount of franchise taxes payable to the United States Government. The amount of the franchise tax is adversely affected only to the extent that the Federal reserve banks are authorized to charge depreciation and amortization allowances on their bank premises to current net earnings.

The building is not a public building and is not built with public money. Under the law it is subject to local and State taxation.

The estimated cost of the bank and annex buildings are as follows:

Estimated cost of bank and annex buildings—exclusive of equipment.

Annex building (finished):
Land cost	$681,558.69
Building cost	1,388,185.40

AGRICULTURAL ENTRIES OF ALASKAN COAL LANDS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 8842) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska, and I submit a report (No. 398) thereon.

The other day the Senate passed a bill of this exact nature, and the House passed this bill on about the same day. Therefore I ask for the immediate consideration of the House bill. I will state to the Senate that the amendments which were made in the Senate bill I have incorporated in the House bill which I have just reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of my colleague whether there are any changes made in the bill as passed by the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever. With the amendments which I now report the House bill is exactly the same as the bill which recently passed the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 12, before the word "initiated," to strike out "prior to the passage of this act"; on page 1, line 15, after the word "therein," to strike out "and not otherwise reserved or withdrawn"; on page 2, line 22, after the word "under," to strike out "said laws as applicable to Alaska" and to insert "the laws of the United States"; and on page 3, line 21, after the words "And provided further," in line 20, to strike out "That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to authorize the entry or disposition of withdrawn or classified coal lands or lands valuable for coal, oil, or gas under section 2306, United States Revised Statutes, or acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, commonly known as soldiers' homestead law," and to insert in lieu thereof "That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to authorize the entry or disposition, under section 2306, United States Revised Statutes, or under acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, of withdrawn or classified coal, oil, or gas lands or of lands valuable for coal, oil, or gas," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act homestead claims may be initiated by actual settlers on public lands of the United States in Alaska known to contain workable coal, oil, or gas deposits, or that may be valuable for the coal, oil, or gas contained therein, and which are not otherwise reserved or withdrawn, whenever such claim shall be initiated with a view of obtaining or passing title with a reservation to the United States of the coal, oil, or gas in such lands, and of the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same; and any settler who has initiated a homestead claim in good faith on lands containing workable deposits of coal, oil, or gas, or that may be valuable for the coal, oil, or gas contained therein, may perfect the same under the provisions of the laws under which the claim was initiated, but shall receive the limited patent provided for in this act: Provided, however, That should it be discovered at any time prior to the issuance of a final certificate on any claim initiated for unreserved lands in Alaska that the lands are coal, oil, or gas in character, the patent issued on such entry shall contain the reservation required by this act.

SEC. 2. That upon satisfactory proof of full compliance with the provisions of the laws under which the entry is made and of this act the entryman shall be entitled to a patent to the lands entered by him, which patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal, oil, or gas in the land so patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal, oil, or gas deposits so reserved shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the laws applicable to coal, oil, or gas deposits or coal, oil, or gas lands in Alaska in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to acquire coal, oil, or gas deposits, or the right to mine and remove the coal or to drill for and remove the oil or gas under the laws of the United States, shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands entered or patented, as provided by the provisions of this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal, oil, or gas therein, upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking to be filed with him as security for the payment of all damages to the crops and improvements on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal, oil, or gas deposits in any such land, or the right to mine, drill for, or remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining and removal of the coal, oil, or gas therefrom, and mine and remove the coal or drill for and remove the oil or gas upon payment of the damages caused thereby to the owner thereof, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond or undertaking in an action instituted in any competent court to ascertain and fix said damages: Provided, That the owner under such limited patent shall have the right to mine the coal for use on the land for domestic purposes at any time prior to the disposal by the United States of the coal deposits: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the exploration upon or entry of any coal deposits withdrawn from such exploration and purchase: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to authorize the entry or disposition under section 2306, United States Revised Statutes, or under acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, of withdrawn or classified coal, oil, or gas lands or of lands valuable for coal, oil, or gas.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am about to report from the Committee on Appropriations a bill which comes from the House under a new title and under a different arrangement of expenditures than heretofore. It is the first one of the great annual supply bills for this session, and changes have seemed to be made necessary in the terms and names of several other of the supply bills, because of the Budget law recently enacted.

In reporting the bill, I wish to give notice that I shall undertake to-morrow, at the close of the routine morning business, to bring the bill before the Senate for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon the Budget law and its application and upon the terms of our Senate rules, which seem somewhat ajar when compared with the law aforementioned and with the changes in names and arrangement of items in the annual appropriation bills which will come to us later. The changes have thrown out of gear the names and arrangement of bills and committees as comprehended at present in our rules.

I now report from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 399) thereon.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Wyoming, in view of the rather extraordinary character of this measure, whether the committee present figures in their report by which we may institute a comparison as to the cost of the various items carried in the bill with the cost heretofore? I have read the bill, and it looks to me as though one would have to go back to three or four bills in the past in order to find the items or the subjects which receive recommendation in this bill, and therefore it is impossible to institute a comparison except by an examination of those bills, unless the committee submit such a report.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that we have presented a report as to the totals which will show just the information to which the Senator has referred, and during the consideration of the measure I shall be glad to respond to any inquiries the Senator may make, knowing the inquiring mind the Senator has with reference to appropriations.

Mr. KING. The Senator, I am sure, ought to be glad to have some support, because I have been glad to support him.

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator, and I hope the Senator will continue to give me his support.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming, in view of his statement that certain changes seemed to be necessary in the program of the Appropriations Committee. I do not understand exactly what changes are recommended by the bill which the Senator has just reported. In view of the fact that he states he will bring the matter up again to-morrow, I should like to have him state, if he will in brief, the character of the new program of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say to the Senator that the Appropriations Committee will present no program, but will present to the Senate the condition in which we find ourselves and ask the Senate to arrange matters in whatever way may seem best.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What arrangement does the Senator expect to request the Senate to make?

Mr. WARREN. I propose to bring before the Senate the reasons why the present rules contain some ambiguity, together with opinions of many of our predecessors and contemporaries as to the most efficient way of handling appropriation bills.

In fact, there would be referred to the general Appropriations Committee but two bills, if we followed them by name only. Those would be the two bills which are perhaps of least consequence as to aggregate amounts, and so forth—the District of Columbia appropriation bill and the deficiency appropriation bill. On the other hand, there will be a number of bills with other names, which are not named in our rules, but which I assume would go to the Appropriations Committee because of their having no name that is carried in our existing rules.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What are those?

Mr. WARREN. There would be the appropriation bills for the Treasury, the State and Justice Departments, the Interior Department, the independent offices, and others for which we have no names heretofore. The subcommittees which have been arranged heretofore under the old names or titles will, of course, have to be rearranged under the new line of bills, according to title and contents.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The bills to which the Senator refers are those matters which heretofore have been acted upon by the Appropriations Committee through its subcommittees?

Mr. WARREN. Some of them, and some of them by other committees of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What does it include that heretofore have been acted on by other committees?

Mr. WARREN. For instance, there will now come before Congress bills providing appropriations for the War Department, the Navy Department, the Post Office Department, and the Agricultural Department by name, as has been the case heretofore.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator desire——

Mr. WARREN. One moment, if the Senator pleases. There will be contained in the bills I have named various and sundry items which have heretofore been carried in other bills, and some of the other bills will carry items—a very few, if any, however—which have heretofore been embraced in the four other bills mentioned by me. I shall try to lay before the Senate to-morrow morning exactly what the condition will be.

I desire to say, furthermore, to the Senate that if the so-called budget law is put into effect as it was intended it will require us to pursue very much the same procedure as the other House is now pursuing and under which they are working so harmoniously and expeditiously in the present Congress. On the other hand, if it be sought to divide the jurisdiction over the various appropriation bills as heretofore, then, I think, it will be better that the rule shall distinctly refer to the bills under this new designation and cause their reference to whatever committees may be provided. My purpose will be to state the facts and to introduce a resolution which may go to the Committee on Rules in order that they may consider the entire subject.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Heretofore, so far as I know, a number of the measures to which the Senator from Wyoming has referred, such, for instance, as the Post Office appropriation bill, the Army appropriation bill, and the naval appropriation bill, have been dealt with by the several committees having charge of those subjects matter, as especially provided under our rules.

Mr. WARREN. Exactly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There has been no change made in the rules of the Senate, so far as I know, in that respect.

Mr. WARREN. No; there has not been in reference to those measures.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And there is no general law which requires any change to be made as to the mode of the disposition of such measures under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. There has been no law passed dealing specifically with that matter, but the general budget law requires rearrangement, and of course it is intended that such rearrangement shall be made.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The budget law is a law which relates exclusively to the executive department, and I hope it is going to have the effect which the Senator from Wyoming has stated; but the arrangement in the House of Representatives seems to be simply to substitute one set of committees for another set of committees; that is about all. The committees which are substituted may be better committees than were previously provided, but still they are, to all intents and purposes, separate committees dealing with these separate subjects. They are called subcommittees, but everyone knows that, as a matter of fact, the subcommittee on military appropriations does not go into the details which are dealt with by the subcommittee on Post Office Appropriations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment I will yield.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has referred to the expedition in the consideration of appropriation bills which has resulted from the adoption of the new method in the other House; but my recollection is that some of the appropriation bills which were dealt with by the subcommittees of the House Committee on Appropriations were not passed until some weeks after the fiscal year for which they provided had begun. Instead of there being expedition, therefore, there seems to have been a great deal of delay.

There has also been considerable talk about the economies which would result from the new system; but I have noticed that the recommendations for naval appropriations, for instance, which have been made to Congress by the Bureau of the Budget amount to something like $425,000,000, notwithstanding the proposed curtailment of naval construction.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one moment, if the Senator from Wyoming please.

Mr. WARREN. Very well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There may be economy in that, but it is difficult to see where the economy comes in. It looks very much as though the procedure will be just as it has been heretofore, and that Congress will be the economical body, so far as the comparison of actual appropriations with recommendations made by the executive department is concerned, and will be engaged in curtailing and cutting down the recommendations made by the so-called Director of the Budget instead of being induced by the Budget Bureau to curtail its appropriations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Presient, I demand the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is reports of committees.

Mr. WARREN. I had hoped to correct the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] if he had been kind enough to allow me to do so, for he and I will not differ on the matter. I alluded to House procedure of this session, since the new organization, when I spoke of harmony, efficiency, and dispatch in House consideration of appropriation bills. In the last Congress the budget alternative estimates had not been received and adopted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator. He knows that there was no intention of any discourtesy on my part.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar. The regular order is reports of committees.

AMENDMENT OF VOLSTEAD ACT.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, when petitions and memorials were being presented the petition which I hold in my hand was on its way from my office. I wish now, before presenting the petition, to make a brief statement regarding it, and I ask unanimous consent that I may do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from New Jersey will proceed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, there is in my State an organization which is known as the Anti-Dry League of New Jersey. In August last this organization presented a petition similar to the one now before me which purported to be signed by 35,000 citizens of New Jersey. At that time I presented the petition to the Senate and asked that it be filed with the proper committee.

About two months ago the petition I now desire to present was sent to me by express and by mistake was delivered at my house. About two weeks ago I found it and ascertained what it was, although I had been advised by the petitioners that it was to be sent; and I had intended when the Senate had the opportunity to consider it to present it at the proper time.

The antidry league has seen fit, through its officers, to attack me for suppressing, ignoring, and withholding this petition. I wish to say that such a public statement is entirely untrue, as I have during my entire career always presented to the Senate petitions addressed to the Congress or to myself.

This petition purports to be signed by 15,000 citizens of my State who are opposed to the present Volstead Act. They appeal to the House of Representatives and the Senate to vote for a modification of the Volstead Act. Of course, I am opposed to a modification of that act, having voted for it only a few weeks ago; but, believing in the right of petition, I now present this petition, which, as I have said, purports to be signed by 15,000 citizens of my State, in favor of a modification of the Volstead Act, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be received and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MARY ROBERTS.

Mr. CALDER. I report back favorably from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, Senate resolution 203, submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] on the 4th instant, proposing to pay Mary Roberts, widow of Charles F. Roberts, late a private of the Capitol police, a sum equal to six months' salary. It is the usual resolution in cases of this kind, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Mary Roberts, widow of Charles F. Roberts, late a private of the Capitol police, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. KING and Mr. HARRIS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS OF EUROPEAN STATES.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent that it may be read and considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For information the Secretary will read the resolution.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 208), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and hereby is, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to lay before the Senate such information regarding the revenues, expenditures, and deficits of the European States as may be available to the Department of State, showing for the last and current fiscal years especially the annual cost of land armaments in the several States, as compared with the annual deficits of the several States (including both "ordinary" and "extraordinary" expenditures) and the sum of the interest annually due from the several States on account of the loans made to them by the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that it may go over until after I address the Senate, because I think it will lead to some debate.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, has the morning business closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands there is objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois. It will go over.

Mr. McCORMICK. I can imagine no ground for objecting to a request for this information.

Mr. HARRIS. Evidently the Senator was not in the Chamber earlier this morning. Some days ago I gave notice that on last Friday I should address the Senate, and the Senate was not in session then. This morning I was recognized again to address the Senate, and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] asked me if I would not give way until the morning business was over, which I did. I do not wish to object to the request of the Senator from Illinois, but I am sure that after that agreement he will not wish to interfere with the address I am going to make. After my address is concluded I shall be very glad to have the other matter taken up.

Mr. McCORMICK. I shall be delighted to meet the convenience of the Senator from Georgia. May I ask, while so many Senators are in the Chamber, if there are any who might have an objection to acting to-day upon this resolution, which seeks information, and nothing else?

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection if it can be passed without debate.

Mr. SMITH. What is the resolution?

Mr. McCORMICK. It has been read once. I ask that it be read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution was again read by the reading clerk.

Mr. McCORMICK. I simply wanted to give Senators who might be disposed to object an opportunity to object now, because I want to ask unanimous consent for a vote upon the resolution before an hour or more has passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, why can we not finish the routine morning business and then take up this resolution, if there is to be a discussion of an hour?

Mr. HARRIS. I must object, because it will lead to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the resolution will go over.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—NOMINATION OF SENATORS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to offer a new rule, to be added to the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to the nomination and election of United States Senators.

The Supreme Court held the corrupt practices act unconstitutional so far as it related to the nomination of Senators. The Justices of the Supreme Court in handing down their opinion said:

As each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own Members, and as Congress may by law regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections, the National Government is not without power to protect itself against corruption, fraud, or other malign influences.

The rule which I present modifies the corrupt practices act so as to make it a rule of the Senate, and thereby avoid the constitutional question which was decided by the Supreme Court. If it should be adopted and enforced, the method of relief against extravagant expenditures will be the same in the Senate that it would have been under the act if the act had been held constitutional. I ask that the rule may be incorporated in the record of the proceedings without reading and that it may be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE's resolution (S. Res. 210) was referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That the Standing Rules of the Senate be, and the same are hereby, amended by inserting after Rule VI an additional rule, as follows:

STATEMENT OF RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES OF CANDIDATE FOR NOMINATION FOR UNITED STATES SENATOR.

Every person who shall be a candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention, or for indorsement at any general or special election, as Senator in the Congress of the United States, shall, not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day for holding such primary election or nominating convention and not less than 10 nor more than 15 days before the day of the general or special election at which he is seeking indorsement, file with the Secretary of the Senate at Washington, D. C., a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination or election.

Every such candidate for nomination at any primary election or nominating convention or for indorsement or election at any general or special election shall, within 15 days, after such primary election or nominating convention and within 30 days after any such general or special election, file with the Secretary of the Senate a full, correct, and itemized statement of all moneys and things of value received by him or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, from any source, in aid or support of his candidacy, together with the names of all those who have furnished the same in whole or in part; and such statement shall contain a true and itemized account of all moneys and things of value given, contributed, expended, used, or promised by such candidate or by his agent, representative, or other person for and in his behalf with his knowledge and consent up to, on, and after the day of such primary election, nominating convention, general or special election, together with the names of all those to whom any and all such gifts, contributions, payments, or promises were made for the purpose of procuring his nomination, indorsement, or election.

Every such candidate shall include therein a statement of every promise or pledge made by him, or by anyone for him with his knowledge and consent, or to whom he has given authority to make any such promise or pledge, before the completion of any such primary election or nominating convention or general or special election, relative to the appointment or recommendation for appointment of any person to any position of trust, honor, or profit, either in the county, State, or Nation, or in any political subdivision thereof, or in any private or corporate employment, for the purpose of procuring the support of such person or of any person in his candidacy, and if any such promise or pledge shall have been made, the name or names, the address or addresses, and the occupation or occupations of the person or persons to whom such promise or pledge shall have been made shall be stated, together with a description of the position relating to which such promise or pledge has been made. In the event that no such promise or pledge has been made by such candidate that fact shall be distinctly stated.

No candidate for Senator of the United States shall promise any office or position to any person, or to use his influence, or to give his support to any person for any office or position for the purpose of procuring the support of such person, or of any person, in his candidacy; but such candidate may, within the limitations and restrictions and subject to the requirements of this rule, contribute to political committees having charge of the disbursement of campaign funds.

No candidate for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise, or cause to be given, contributed, expended, used, or promised, in procuring his nomination and election, any sum, in the aggregate, in excess of the amount which he may lawfully give, contribute, expend, or promise under the laws of the State in which he resides: Provided, That no candidate for Senator of the United States shall give, contribute, expend, use, or promise any sum, in the aggregate, exceeding $10,000 in any campaign for his nomination and election: Provided further, That money expended by any such candidate to meet and discharge any assessment, fee, or charge made or levied upon candidates by the laws of his State, or for his necessary personal expenses, incurred for himself alone, for travel and subsistence or stationery and postage, writing or printing (other than in newspapers), and distributing letters, circulars, and posters, and for telegraph and telephone service, shall not be regarded as an expenditure within the meaning of this rule, and shall not be considered any part of the sum herein fixed as the limit of expense, and need not be shown in the statements herein required to be filed.

The statements herein required to be made and filed before the general election, at which such candidate seeks election, need not contain items of which publicity is given in a previous statement, but the statement required to be made and filed after said general election shall, in addition to an itemized statement of all expenses not theretofore given publicity, contain a summary of all preceding statements.

Every statement herein required shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the candidate, taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths; and the depositing of any such statement in a regular post office directed to the Secretary of the Senate, duly stamped and registered, within the time required herein, shall be deemed a sufficient filing of any such statement under this rule.

This rule shall not be construed to annul or vitiate the laws of any State, not directly in conflict herewith, relating to the nomination or election of candidates for the offices herein named, or to exempt any such candidate from complying with such State laws.

That nothing contained in this rule shall limit or affect the right of any person to spend money for proper legal expenses in maintaining or contesting the results of any election.

That every person willfully violating any of the foregoing provisions shall be denied the right to become a Member of the Senate.

INTERNAL AFFAIRS OF CHINA.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution which I ask to have read and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 209), as follows:

Whereas it has been the traditional policy of the United States to refrain from interfering with the domestic policy and internal affairs of other nations, and from attempting to direct or to control the exercise of their sovereign national rights; and

Whereas China has for centuries been an independent nation governing its territories and people, and promoting the peace of the State and the welfare of the people, according to Chinese customs and institutions; and

Whereas it is the sovereign right of every nation to determine its own domestic policy and to conduct its internal affairs, including the laying and collection of taxes, in its own way, and according to the national will; and

Whereas at the Conference for the Limitation of Armament, now in session, certain powers, including the United States, have under consideration the adoption of a program which would control the Chinese finances and taxes, and would otherwise abridge the political and fiscal autonomy of China: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that the traditional policy of the United States to refrain from interference with the internal affairs of other nations be adhered to, at this time, in all dealings and relations between the United States and China; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its disapproval of any policy or program which seeks to abridge the political independence, or to restrict the administrative or financial autonomy of China, or which seeks in any manner to limit Chinese national authority, with regard to the enactment of such laws or measures as China may deem necessary to the national welfare, provided, of course, that such laws or measures be consistent with international law; and be it further

Resolved, That any attempt to require China, by treaty or otherwise, to fix the tariff duties which she may be permitted to lay and collect upon imports, or to control the internal taxation of China, is in contravention of the settled policy of the United States, and an unwarranted interference with the independent powers and sovereign rights of the Chinese Government, and is in violation of international law and that international comity which should exist between free and independent States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. KING. I ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be printed.

MEAT PACKERS IN UNRELATED LINES OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I submit a resolution which I ask may be printed and lie on the table subject to my call.

The resolution (S. Res. 211) was read, as follows:

Whereas the former Attorney General, in 1919, following a public announcement that indictments would be sought against the five principal meat-packing companies for alleged violation of the Sherman law, did enter into negotiations with certain representatives of the said meat-packing companies or others, as a result of which on February 27, 1920, a consent decree was entered in a case brought for that purpose in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, to wit, United States v. Swift & Co. et al.; and

Whereas there was much publicity as to the alleged benefits that were to result to the public from said consent decree, and particularly that it was to take the packer defendants out of unrelated lines, such as the grocery business, and make them "butchers and nothing more"; and

Whereas in the last three years there have been several reorganizations of packer companies, both before and since the decree, such as those by which the stockholders of Swift & Co. and of Wilson & Co. (Inc.) continue to control very large grocery businesses through Libby, McNeil & Libby and through Austin, Nichols & Co. (Inc.), respectively, and Armour interests likewise still control the Conway Hotel Supply Co., formerly Smith, Richardson & Conroy, a grocery and meat-distributing concern in Florida, and other reorganizations, such as the Armour Leather Co. and the Swift Internacional, some of these reorganizations being tantamount to evasions of the decree, and others tending to confuse the public as to the real extent of packer control in various industries; and

Whereas the existence of said consent decree was a factor affecting the consideration of legislation by the committees of Congress and by Congress itself, to wit, packer and stockyards act, 1921, in that while this legislation was pending the consent decree was agreed to, and based upon that fact provisions concerning unrelated items were stricken from the bill and the said act was passed on the assumption that the decree would stand unchanged; and

Whereas strong efforts have been and are now being made to have the Attorney General seek modification of the decree, so as to permit all the packer defendants to engage without hindrance in the unrelated lines, including groceries: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Attorney General should not, without specific authorization of Congress, advocate nor consent to any modification of the decree already entered in this cause, and that the Committee on Agriculture be authorized and directed to investigate this entire matter and recommend to the Senate what action it deems necessary in the premises.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. EDGE. Under our unanimous consent agreement we are to proceed to vote on to-morrow, January 17, 1922, at 1 o'clock, and after 1 o'clock no address longer than five minutes is to be made, on Senate bill 2263, to amend the Federal reserve act. I ask whether any additional amendment to that bill has been offered during the morning hour?

Mr. SMITH. No additional amendment has been offered. It is our purpose to bring the bill up as soon as the morning hour is closed so that we may utilize as much of to-day as possible in the discussion of it, and of such amendments as may be offered.

Mr. HARRIS. Two amendments have already been offered.

Mr. EDGE. I wanted to know whether any additional amendments had been offered during the morning hour, or, if not, whether any additional amendments were to be offered.

Mr. SMITH. I am not advised as to that. I have heard of none being offered this morning.

Mr. EDGE. Or an amendment in the nature of a substitute, or whatever it might be. This is a very important subject, and, as the Senator from South Carolina has suggested, I understand there are some additional amendments or substitutes, whatever term might be used, to be offered, and, if so, it would seem to me very important that they be introduced now so that they can be printed and the Members of the Senate have an opportunity to study any suggested changes, in view of the early date arranged for a vote. That was my only object in making the inquiry.

Mr. SMITH. I presume now is as good a time as any to state that after due consideration and conference amongst those who are responsible for this matter being brought up at this time, and in view of certain assurances given me, there will be offered a substitute for the bill introduced by me in behalf of myself and others, and at the time that substitute is offered I shall ask that the bill I have offered be withdrawn and that the substitute be supported. I shall do that because I believe the objects sought to be attained will be more readily attained and more satisfactorily attained, perhaps, by the passage of the substitute than if the original proposition were agreed to.

I am sure that all those with whom I have conferred have the same object in view that we have. It is simply a question of a difference of method of reaching it. I have been in conference with all the powers that would have control of this matter, and at the invitation of the President I had a conference with him, and I am satisfied that the measure which will be offered as a substitute for my bill will meet all the objects sought to be attained, and perhaps more expeditiously than would be true under mine. Therefore, at the time the substitute is offered, I propose to ask that my bill be withdrawn and the substitute supported.

Mr. EDGE. I am not in any way discussing the merits of the proposed substitute, because I have not seen it; I have only seen some references to it in the newspapers. I am particularly interested in that character of legislation, and would like to see the substitute as soon as possible, in view of the early hour for a vote, so that we can study it and be prepared to discuss it. It may be, as the Senator has suggested, that the substitute will entirely meet the objections which have heretofore been urged. I hope it will; but I would like to see the substitute.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I took advantage of the question asked by the Senator from New Jersey to make the statement I have just made. To repeat, I think, after my conferences both with the President and with those with whom I have been collaborating in this matter, that the substitute will attain the objects sought, and I am satisfied with it, and propose to support it. I think this is an opportune time for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who will offer the substitute, to present it, so that we may be informed fully as to its terms and the objects to be attained.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, is it in order now to introduce bills?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). That is the order of business.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield for a question; but I want to offer this amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Minnesota evidently was not here when the Senate convened. I consented to yield the floor until the morning business might be finished, on the request of the Senator from Kansas, and I will have to ask that I now have the floor, if the morning business is closed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands we are still proceeding in the morning hour. The Senator from Minnesota desires to introduce a bill, which is in order.

Mr. MYERS. As I understand the situation, the bill comes up for vote to-morrow at 1 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not the unfinished business? Does it not come up to-day at 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have not yet reached that order.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I propose to offer a substitute for Senate bill 2263 to amend the Federal reserve act, which was reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes to explain it, as Senators have asked some questions with regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Minnesota may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Several bills were introduced during the last session of Congress to enable the President to appoint a representative of agriculture upon the Federal Reserve Board, one to place the Secretary of Agriculture upon the board, another to increase the membership of the board to eight, and, I believe, some others which it is not necessary for me now to discuss.

I introduced the one which the committee reported, but in reporting it they struck out the extra member and most of the rest of the bill, but did report a bill. Now I offer as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee an amendment, which I will not stop to read, because I do not wish to delay the morning business, but I can in a moment state to Senators present the difference between the present Federal reserve act and the amendment which I now propose to offer.

The present Federal reserve act provides for a Federal Reserve Board of seven members, of which the Secretary of the Treasury and the comptroller shall be ex officio members, and that in the appointment of the five remaining members the President shall have due regard to a fair representation of the different commercial, industrial, and geographical divisions of the country. Senators will see that the President was not required to appoint certain representatives, but merely to have due regard to a fair representation of the different businesses of the country and of the geographical divisions of the country.

Section 10 of that act also provided:

> Of the five members then appointed by the President, at least two shall be persons experienced in banking and finance.

The original bill, as reported by the committee simply adds the word "agriculture" and does not increase the membership of the board so that a representative of agriculture could be appointed. Many Senators have conferred about the bill, and objections were made to some of the amendments which directed the President to appoint a farmer, or directed him to appoint a banker, or directed him to appoint a man of any other occupation, but they were willing that the membership of the board should be increased and that the language should be changed so as to include the various financial, agricultural, industrial, and commercial interests of the country.

Now, the only difference between the present Federal reserve act and the amendment which I have proposed is that the amendment contains the following clause:

> The President shall have due regard—

That is, in making the appointment of the six members—> to a fair representation of the financial, agricultural, industrial, commercial interests and geographical divisions of the country.

Agriculture is placed upon the same basis as the other industries of the country, as it was not placed in the original bill, and the clause that two shall be bankers was left out and a general designation included here. Presumably the President, of course, would appoint men who have had experience in banking.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, does not the amendment strike out that provision for the appointment of bankers?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; and agriculture is placed in the general definition—that the President shall have regard to a fair representation of the financial, agricultural, industrial, commercial interests and geographical divisions of the country.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator read again the section from the present act referring to the banking qualifications? As I recall it, it is not mandatory, but provides only that they shall have a knowledge of banking and finance.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; it is mandatory that he shall appoint two, at least, who shall be persons experienced in banking or finance; and, of course, it has always been considered that he must appoint a couple of bankers, and he always has.

Mr. McLEAN. The law does not require that.

Mr. KELLOGG. The President has always held that it did.

Mr. McLEAN. It is in the disjunctive, if the Senator will read the language carefully.

Mr. KELLOGG. The present amendment which I have introduced is the same thing.

Mr. McLEAN. But the Senator wants an increase of the board.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. McLEAN. And the express purpose is, I assume, for the putting on of a farmer.

Mr. KELLOGG. For the express purpose of putting on a representative of the biggest industry of this Nation.

Mr. McLEAN. The President can put on five farmers if he wants to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, as I understand, this allows him to appoint a farmer.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. McLEAN. He can do it to-day.

Mr. KELLOGG. He can not do it to-day, for there is no vacancy.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is rather an indication that he should appoint a farmer.

Mr. McLEAN. There are two farmers to-day, and he can put farmers in the other three places if he wants to.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is an indication from Congress that he must put on a farmer.

Mr. KELLOGG. The President could not appoint a representative of agriculture to-day if he wanted to, because there is no vacancy, and he has no power to remove any member of the board.

Mr. EDGE. There is nothing, then, in the suggested amendment, as I follow the Senator's explanation, to compel the President to put a farmer on if an additional member of the board is permitted, is there?

Mr. KELLOGG. No.

Mr. EDGE. The mandate goes simply to the point of stating that he shall consider those interests. Is not that it?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is it. I do not believe it good policy in this law to direct the President to put on one or two bankers, one manufacturer, one representative of labor, one farmer. I believe that he ought to be required to give due consideration to all these great industrial interests. Farming is the greatest of all of them, not only in its benefit to the Nation but in its credit, which they must have.

Mr. McLEAN. Conceding that, I am perfectly willing to agree there shall be no objection to the phraseology of the Senator's amendment; but why increase the number? Why at this time add another office at an expense of $12,000 a year when it is absolutely unnecessary in order to accomplish the purpose which the Senator seeks?

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator tell me how the President can appoint a representative of agriculture on the board?

Mr. McLEAN. To fill the very first vacancy that comes.

Mr. KELLOGG. When does it come?

Mr. McLEAN. There are two farmers on the board now.

Mr. KELLOGG. When does the first vacancy come?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know.

Mr. KELLOGG. It comes next autumn. About August or September will be the next vacancy. The next vacancy will be created by the retirement of the present chairman, and he is a banker, and I believe the President considers the present act to bind him in good faith to appoint a representative of the banking interests.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the bill being discussed before the Senate for consideration?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is evidently being discussed. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment which has not yet been formally presented.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer the amendment now, and if the Senator objects I will not make any further statement.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that the proposed amendment be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KELLOGG's amendment is as follows:

Strike out, beginning with line 16, all of page 2 and all of page 3 and insert:

"That section 10 of the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 10. A Federal Reserve Board is hereby created which shall consist of eight members, including the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall be members ex officio, and six members appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In selecting the six appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board, not more than one of whom shall be selected from any one Federal reserve district, the President shall have due regard to a fair representation of the financial, agricultural, industrial, commercial interests, and geographical divisions of the country. The six members of the Federal Reserve Board appointed by the President and confirmed as aforesaid shall devote their entire time to the business of the Federal Reserve Board and shall each receive an annual salary of $12,000, payable monthly, together with actual necessary traveling expenses, and the Comptroller of the Currency, as ex officio member of the Federal Reserve Board, shall, in addition to the salary now paid him as Comptroller of the Currency, receive the sum of $7,000 annually for his services as a member of said board.

"'The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank. The appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank, except that this restriction shall not apply to a member who has served the full term for which he was appointed. Of the 6 members thus appointed by the President 1 shall be designated by the President to serve for 2, one for 4, one for 6, 1 for 8, and the balance of the members for 10 years, and thereafter each member so appointed shall serve for a term of 10 years, unless sooner removed for cause by the President. Of the six persons thus appointed, one shall be designated by the President as governor and one as vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board. The governor of the Federal Reserve Board, subject to its supervision, shall be the active executive officer. The Secretary of the Treasury may assign offices in the Department of the Treasury for the use of the Federal Reserve Board. Each member of the Federal Reserve Board shall within 15 days after notice of appointment make and subscribe to the oath of office.

"'The Federal Reserve Board shall have the power to levy semiannually upon the Federal reserve banks, in proportion to their capital stock and surplus, an assessment sufficient to pay its estimated expenses and the salaries of its members and employees for the half year succeeding the levying of such assessment, together with any deficit carried forward from the preceding half year.

"'The first meeting of the Federal Reserve Board shall be held in Washington, D. C., as soon as may be after the passage of this act, at a date to be fixed by the Reserve Bank Organization Committee. The Secretary of the Treasury shall be ex officio chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. No member of the Federal Reserve Board shall be an officer or director of any bank, banking institution, trust company, or Federal reserve bank nor hold stock in any bank, banking institution, or trust company; and before entering upon his duties as a member of the Federal Reserve Board he shall certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he has complied with this requirement. Whenever a vacancy shall occur, other than by expiration of term, among the five members of the Federal Reserve Board appointed by the President, as above provided, a successor shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill such vacancy, and when appointed he shall hold office for the unexpired term of the member whose place he is selected to fill.

"'The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen on the Federal Reserve Board during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire 30 days after the next session of the Senate convenes.

"'Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as taking away any powers heretofore vested by law in the Secretary of the Treasury which relate to the supervision, management, and control of the Treasury Department and bureaus under such department, and wherever any power vested by this act in the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal reserve agent appears to conflict with the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury, such powers shall be exercised subject to the supervision and control of the Secretary.

"'The Federal Reserve Board shall annually make a full report of its operations to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall cause the same to be printed for the information of the Congress.

"'Section 324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be amended so as to read as follows: There shall be in the Department of the Treasury a bureau charged with the execution of all laws passed by Congress relating to the issue and regulation of national currency secured by United States bonds, and, under the general supervision of the Federal Reserve Board, of all Federal reserve notes, the chief officer of which bureau shall be called the Comptroller of the Currency and shall perform his duties under the general directions of the Secretary of the Treasury.'"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have a very high regard for the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] in any matter pertaining to agriculture, but I differ with them about this matter. I strongly favor the passage of a measure which requires that one member of the Federal Reserve Board shall be an experienced farmer, one who is a practical farmer engaged in that occupation and not a theoretical agriculturist.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say to the Senator from Georgia that I am in hearty sympathy with what he wishes, but I wish to say also to the Senator from Georgia that, having had very close touch with the framers of the substitute which has just been offered by the Senator from Minnesota, and having had a conference with the President, together with the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from South Carolina, at the invitation of the President, I am entirely satisfied that if the substitute presented by the Senator from Minnesota is adopted a farmer will be appointed upon this board, and appointed at once.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have very high regard for the President of the United States, as I had for the one previous to the present one. The Senators have a perfect right to their own view after their conference with the President, but I did not have a conference with him and I am proceeding with the information before me. I shall support the bill requiring the appointment of a member of the agricultural business on this board.

Mr. President, I strongly favor the passage of this measure, which requires that one member of the Federal Reserve Board shall be an experienced farmer, one who is a practical farmer engaged in the occupation and not a theoretical agriculturist. The law already requires that two members of this board shall be experienced bankers. The wealth of this country is created principally by the farmers. About one-half the entire population of our country is engaged in this occupation, and recently it has been brought home to us in a way to make anyone understand that the prosperity of our country depends upon the prosperity of the farmers. When they can not sell their products at a profit business and bank failures immediately follow. When the western farmers can not raise cattle, wheat, and corn at a profit, and the southern farmers lose money in the production of cotton and other products, they have no money to buy from the manufacturers of the East. Every section of our country is dependent upon the other, and when we help another section we are helping our own.

I wish to state at the beginning of my remarks that I believe in the worth of the Federal reserve system. Had we not changed the old banking laws which the Republican Party enacted when in power we would have had a panic in this country even before we entered the war. I am complaining of the management of this great banking system, which policy has been a calamity to our country.

I can not understand why certain Senators from the East, representing manufacturing communities, should take the view of the able Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, who is opposing this measure and who intimates that those of us supporting this bill to give the farmers representation on the Federal Reserve Board and supporting other measures to help the farmers are doing it for political purposes.

I have no apologies to offer to the Senator from Connecticut or anyone else for the active support I have given all measures to aid agriculture, and by so doing I have been helping every business industry. They are all dependent upon agriculture. Except for the farmers of the West and the South the manufacturers of the East would be compelled to go out of business, as they could not sell their products. Since I have been a Member of the Senate, no matter how meritorious and necessary measures may be for the benefit of the farmers of the South and the West, there are certain Senators from the East who oppose such measures. Agriculture receives less from the Government in proportion to what it gives than any other industry.

The Federal reserve banks are not banks for bankers to make money out of; it was intended, when created by Congress, and should be, the financial institution that serves every interest, not simply bankers and manufacturers alone, but agriculture, live stock, and all other industries alike. If there had been on this board during the past two years a representative of the agricultural interests of this country I do not think we would have had the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board, which has done such great injury to the farmers and business men of the South and West, and from which it will take years to recover. It has destroyed hundreds of millions in values of farm products.

I believe I was among the first Members of this body to call attention, more than a year ago, to the ruinous deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. Soon after my criticisms an article appeared in one of the Washington papers, which seemed inspired by members of the board, intimating that certain of them would resign if Members of Congress criticized their policy. In my opinion, the country would have been better off had some of them resigned long ago. For my part, if certain members of that board are reappointed I shall oppose their confirmation in the Senate because of their ruinous policies. If Senators from agricultural States, which have suffered such injury by their policy, will join me we shall defeat their confirmation. It is high time these men understand this banking system is not conducted for Wall Street and the money powers of this country.

I have offered two amendments to this measure, which I hope may be adopted. One is to require the consent of Congress before the Federal Reserve Board or the banks can construct bank buildings, and the other is to make the rate of discount the same for all the regional banks.

Under the present law the Federal reserve banks, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, can construct buildings at any cost. No other Government board has such authority, as the Congress has control of such matters. It has been shown that the New York bank spent on their building to accommodate a few hundred employees more than the cost of the Capitol, the State, War, and Navy Building, the Treasury Building, or many other buildings in Washington, some of them with space accommodating several thousand employees. They have spent vast and unnecessary sums on buildings in other cities. They were wasting this money, while declining to reduce the discount rate, which was unnecessarily high.

Patriotic men and women all over this country denied themselves and their families money in order to buy Liberty bonds to conduct the war successfully. The banks over the country, both large and small, urged their customers to buy bonds and were glad to loan money with the bonds as collateral at a low rate of interest. The dividends on the bonds amounted to almost as much as the interest the banks charged on the note of the buyer of the bonds. There were numbers of people in every community who made great sacrifices in order to pay part on the bonds, and borrowed 90 per cent of their value from the banks with the bonds as collateral. When the Federal reserve banks raised the discount rates beyond all reason the banks had to raise their interest rates, which was so much in excess of the dividends on bonds that a large number of the holders of the bonds had to sell them, and bonds went to 85 cents on the dollar. Persons of small and moderate means were forced to sell. They lost $15 on each bond for which they had paid $100. These bonds were then purchased by the rich of the country at this low price, and within a few months the Federal Reserve Board reduced the discount rate; interest on money was reduced, and the value of bonds went up to about par. Many people of great patriotism denied themselves and borrowed money to buy bonds, and they have lost in the past two years their pro rata part, which is approximately two billion dollars, the difference in bonds at $85 and par, which went into the pockets of the millionaires of Wall Street.

Mr. President, more than a year ago I introduced in the Senate a bill reducing the discount rate of the Federal reserve banks to 5 per cent. It should never have been raised to 7 per cent. Also, I introduced a bill allowing 12 months' time on agricultural paper discounted by banks instead of five months, as under the present law. Gov. Harding, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, opposed both of these measures before the Committees on Banking and Currency, to which they were referred. The Republican members of the committees opposed the bills and defeated them. Had these bills passed, millions of people would have been benefited, and they could have held their bonds or sold them at par. They would be prosperous to-day instead of financial wrecks, caused by the policy of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. President, one of the principal reasons for having 12 regional banks instead of one central bank was to prevent any section being discriminated against. I believe in having banks for each section; but under the policy of the Federal Reserve Board they have discriminated against the agricultural sections by charging higher discount rates to the banks of these sections, one of the discriminations which it was intended to avoid when the law was passed. A central bank charging the same rate of interest would be preferable to regional banks controlled absolutely by the Federal Reserve Board, with the officers in these banks doing their bidding and charging higher discount rates in agricultural sections than in manufacturing centers. There can be no excuse for the Government's banking system charging higher discount rates in one section of the country than in another.

Mr. President, reference has been made during this debate—and there has been a great deal in the newspapers—concerning the "agricultural bloc." There has been much unjust criticism because of ignorance of the work of the bloc. I am a member. I have attended all of its meetings, which are held at night at the Capitol, as the members are Senators who give their full time to their duties and work during the day. Very few Members of the Senate have a better record for attendance during the session of the Senate than I have during the three years I have been a Member, and when there is work before the Senate you will always find members of the agricultural bloc present.

At these meetings politics is not discussed. We consider principally measures that benefit those engaged in agriculture and live-stock raising. Most of the criticism comes from Senators of the East, the "manufacturers' bloc," which has dominated legislation of Congress most of the time in the past half century—these men have thought and worked only for measures that benefited the manufacturers. They have demanded and received unnecessarily high protective tariff rates on their goods, but they have given no protection to those engaged in agriculture and many others equally dependent upon the financial success of the farmer.

It has not been many years since a few small New England States dominated Congress. Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island, was chairman of the Finance Committee; Senator Hale, of Maine, chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee; Mr. Dingley, of Maine, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in the House. Thomas B. Reed was Speaker, and many other able men from that section were in high positions. These men were not orators and did not make long speeches, but they were the most influential men in Congress. They honestly believed in a high tariff for manufacturers of their section, but they could not understand the great injustice this did to those engaged in agriculture, who had to pay high prices for everything they bought and received no protection on the products of the farm which they sold. The New England manufacturers were not satisfied with getting protection at the expense of the farmers and laboring people, but they declined to give protection to the farmer and laboring man from pauper labor of Europe. They brought over annually to this country hundreds of thousands of foreigners—some years more than a million pauper laborers—to compete with our working people.

A few months after the World War stopped I introduced a measure to stop all immigration for five years, and every Republican on the committee, except one, voted against it. The best we could do was to reduce the number of immigrants coming over in one year to 3 per cent of the number in the racial groups already here under the 1910 census. There are several million men in this country out of employment, many of them suffering, but Congress continues to allow the immigrants to come over here and take positions that should be held by our own citizens. Many of those out of employment are ex-soldiers whose courage and self-sacrifice saved this country and the world. I am glad to see that the American Legion has recently approved the principle of the measure I advocated, to stop the influx of the foreigners for five years, and I am hopeful of results along that line. It is a crime to allow foreigners to come here and work for so little, while our good citizens are deprived of employment necessary to support their families.

Mr. President, the agricultural bloc is composed of Republican and Democratic Senators from the agricultural sections of the South and West who are especially interested in helping the farmers, and knowing full well that when the farmers are prosperous manufacturers and all others engaged in business will benefit and share in the prosperity. I hope I may be pardoned for reminding eastern Senators who are criticizing the bloc that if western Republican Senators did not vote for legislation to help the farmers they would be left at home in the next election. This is also true and should be so in the agricultural sections of the South, and a Senator who does not do his utmost to aid agriculture should be left at home. There have been in the past a few Senators from the agricultural sections of the South and West who did nothing to help the farmers and were reelected, but I am glad that day has passed; the farmers can not longer be deceived, and business and laboring people depending upon the farmer's success are demanding that their representatives in Congress support legislation that will benefit the farmers.

The very Senators who criticize the agricultural bloc for trying to aid the farmers are always ready to support any legislation suggested to help the railroads. I have no prejudice against the railroads; the country's prosperity depends upon them. They should be encouraged, but they should not be helped at the expense of every other commodity, as was done when Congress, a majority Republicans, passed the Esch-Cummins law and authorized rates guaranteeing the railroads 6 per cent dividends when farmers and business men were losing money. I voted against that bill. Some of those who voted for it now admit their mistake and realize that it has worked a great injury to the business of the country. In order to guarantee this dividend to the railroads the Interstate Commerce Commission raised the railroad rates so high that farmers, cattle raisers, and lumbermen had to pay the railroads for freight almost as much as they received for their products, and this paralyzed all industry. Passenger fares were so high that travel was discouraged. I was the first Senator to urge a reduction in rates, and I am glad we now have a 10 per cent reduction on agricultural products. I regret it is not more.

While we hear adverse criticism of the agricultural bloc, let us consider the good work it has done. Everyone knows the terrible financial condition of the country last year. The farmers lost more on their 1920–21 crop than they can save in several years; they were unable to pay their merchant or banker, and the banks had loaned all they could under the law. The Federal Reserve Board did not come to their relief as they should have. Congress was in session, and, without doing anything to help the condition of the farmer or business man, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the leader of the Republicans in the Senate, made a motion to take a recess for several weeks. It had the support of other leaders on his side of the Chamber and would have passed had it not been for the Republican Members of the agricultural bloc voting with most of the Democrats. The motion to adjourn was defeated by the close vote of 27 to 24. I voted against adjournment. Had my colleague and I voted for the motion, the Senate would have recessed without giving any kind of relief to the farmers and business men.

By defeating the motion to adjourn, Congress remained in session and passed the Norris bill, which placed a billion dollars held by the War Finance Corporation at the disposal of the farmers, business men, and bankers who wished loans on agricultural products and live stock at a low rate of interest. Nearly every bank in the South and West was loaded down with such paper and they had no money to loan for the usual demands. But by discounting all such paper with the War Finance Corporation they had money to accommodate other demands of legitimate business. Except for the passage of this law, and the agricultural bloc is responsible for it, in some agricultural States a large number of banks, business men, and farmers would have failed in business.

By defeating the recess of Congress the agricultural bloc was able to pass the Kenyon-Kendrick bill regulating the five meat packers, the greatest food trust in the world, supplying foodstuffs to every household in America and fixing the price paid for hogs and cattle all over the United States. These five packers in Chicago can raise the cost of living of everyone of the hundred and ten million people of our country, and it was absolutely necessary that they be regulated and the public protected. If these five meat packers would be satisfied with a moderate profit, they could, by their organization and methods, be helpful to the public who buy food, as well as those who raise hogs and cattle.

Soon after my term began in the Senate I received complaint from hog raisers in my State that the meat packers were paying them in some instances 3 cents a pound less for hogs raised in Georgia than in some other States. I introduced a resolution in the Senate directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the matter, and now the situation has been made better in my section. The Federal Trade Commission investigated every part of the meat-packers' business and recommended to Congress the passage of laws to regulate them, so as to protect the hog and cattle raisers and the public. The agricultural bloc is responsible for this legislation.

Except for the bloc the Federal Trade Commission would be abolished and the consumers in this country would be at the mercy of the trusts. The very Senators who criticize the agricultural bloc have tried to destroy this commission, which is doing such great good for the people of this country. The public does not fully realize the great good this commission is doing for our people, and the trusts, who are kept under control by the Federal Trade Commission, have kept up a propaganda, spending millions in trying to destroy that body and attempting to create a prejudice against them. Last year, when all products were reduced, I had complaints from Georgia farmers that bagging and ties, which every farmer has to use in covering cotton bales, was selling at the old high prices, as they were controlled by the trusts. I asked the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation, and soon a reduction in prices on bagging and ties came. I will not mention other splendid things done by the Federal Trade Commission.

I received letters from people in my State and others calling attention to the fact that the Standard Oil Co. was selling gasoline in Chicago at 5 cents a gallon less than in Georgia, when the difference in the cost of transportation was less than 1 cent a gallon. I asked the commission to make an investigation and we found the charges were true, but that they were different companies of the Standard Oil. There are a dozen Standard Oil companies, but most of the stock is owned by practically the same people. There was no competition, but it was contended they were not doing anything illegal.

The commission called the attention of Congress to the discrimination and recommended the enactment of certain laws to correct the evil, but nothing was done by Congress. Soon after I entered the Senate, with the aid of members of the agricultural bloc, I introduced a measure which the Senate passed, preventing the Standard Oil Co. from selling gasoline lower in one State than in another. The Federal Trade Commission has done other splendid work which later I shall call to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. President, it was the Republican members of the agricultural bloc in the Senate, voting with the Democrats, who passed the bill last year to complete the development of Muscle Shoals, which project will mean cheaper fertilizers for all farmers of this country in peace times. It will furnish cheap nitrates for the manufacture of munitions in times of war if we should ever again engage in war, which time I hope and pray may never come.

Every other country has nitrate plants except the United States. We are dependent upon Chile for nitrates. Soon after we declared war on Germany the German Government protested against Chile furnishing this country with nitrates and tried to prevent her doing so.

As a member of the Committee on Territories and also on the fortifications subcommittee on appropriations, I knew I could more intelligently serve on these committees after a personal visit to Hawaii and the Philippine Islands, and I visited these places during the vacation of Congress. While in the Orient, as Japan and China are among our best customers in cotton raised in my section, I visited in those countries. The Chinese are the best friends we have in the world, and the Japanese are our friends. We are Japan's largest customer, and they buy much from us. They do not wish trouble with our country. I am not one of those who believe we are headed for war with Japan, but if such a thing should ever happen, the day which brought the declaration of war would find her gunboats on the coast of Chile to stop our shipments of nitrates to make munitions.

When the Muscle Shoals proposition was before the Senate I offered an amendment providing that nitrates made at the plant during peace times should be sold to the farmers at cost and that the farmers should be given the preference in purchasing it. In my State alone we have used in one year more than $50,000,000 of fertilizers. If this plant should be developed as proposed it would save the farmers of Georgia more than $10,000,000 a year on the cost of fertilizers, which is equal to the total annual expenses of my State government, including Confederate pensions and common schools.

After the Muscle Shoals measure passed the Senate it was defeated in the House by a small majority. Unfortunately for the country, the Republican leaders in the House made a partisan measure of it. A leading Republican during the House debate told his Republican colleagues that if Muscle Shoals was located in the North there would be hardly any votes against it. The site for this project was selected by a nonpartisan board of Army officers and only because there was more power to be had there than any place removed from the coast, so it could be protected in time of war. Unfortunately, at times, the merits of a question are not considered when partisanship rules. Some of those opposing the measure went so far as to say that it was just a scheme of President Wilson to build up the South by furnishing the southern farmers cheap fertilizers and factories to get cheap power. I feel sure that the Secretary of War will consider the matter from the standpoint of a business man and what is best for our Government and that Congress will pass legislation that will develop this wonderful project, on which the Government has already spent millions. It will be wasted unless something is done to save it. It will mean much to the farmers of this country in securing cheap fertilizers. I feel sure it will be supported by the agricultural bloc.

Mr. President, the agricultural bloc is not sectional nor narrow, and while we were organized principally to promote legislation that will help the farmers and indirectly help all business, at the same time, you will find the members working for every measure for the good of our country, and you will not find them supporting measures urged by paid lobbyists who infest the Capitol. They are always fighting for justice for all citizens and not special interests.

When legislation to raise revenue for the support of the Government was before the Senate it was Republican members of the bloc, joining with Democrats, who prevented the bill recommended by the Finance Committee from becoming a law until they eliminated many important items intended to relieve the taxes of the millionaires and place the burden on those who toil. Wall Street papers and other newspapers dominated by wealth denounced the revenue measure as it passed the Senate because it taxed wealth as well as those who work. These papers charge that the bill was a repudiation of the Republican platform. It is a fact no one will contradict that until President Wilson's administration all taxes to support the Government were paid by the consumers of the country through the tariff and other taxes, and the wealth of the country, most able to pay, escaped taxation while receiving the greatest benefits from our Government. During the World War the number of millionaires was more than doubled, and they hoped to escape taxation on their wealth when the Republicans came into power. This would have been done had the Republican members of the agricultural bloc not joined with the Democrats and defeated legislation planned by Republican leaders. The Republicans succeeded in repealing the tax imposed upon corporations making excess profits, though several Republicans of the bloc voted with the Democrats to defeat its repeal.

While this revenue bill was before the Senate I offered an amendment to the bill cutting in half the tax on the first few thousand dollars of income earned by those engaged in trades and professions. Every Democrat in the Senate supported my amendment and the only Republicans voting for it were members of the agricultural bloc. I took the position that earned income on the first few thousand should not be taxed, the same as income from bonds and stocks owned by persons who did not work to earn a livelihood. It was the Republican members of the agricultural bloc and the Democrats which made the surtax on incomes of over $100,000 50 per cent instead of 35 per cent, as it passed the House and was recommended by the Senate Finance Committee. Many other items in the revenue bill which relieved wealth of taxes were changed.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] offered his resolution authorizing the President to call a conference of nations to consider the limitation of armaments, out of which grew the conference meeting in this city some weeks ago, it is well known that nearly every leading Republican in the Senate opposed it. Senators POINDEXTER and HALE, ranking members of the Naval Affairs Committee, in the absence of the chairman, Senator PAGE, called on President Harding, and while at the White House gave out interviews declaring opposition to the Borah resolution. Administration supporters in the Senate continued their opposition to the measure. But when the Democrats of the Senate and the Republican Senators of the agricultural bloc actively supported the resolution the Republican leaders saw that it would pass over their opposition, and the leaders ceased opposing the Borah resolution.

Mr. President, my State, like a majority of the States, is largely interested in agriculture, and the members of the agricultural bloc are in sympathy with the cause. They assisted me when I asked for special appropriations to get rid of the boll weevil, which causes loss to Georgia farmers alone of many millions annually; it almost totally destroyed the cotton crop in many counties. The peach pest has done untold injury to the crop, and special funds were secured for this fight. It is conceded that we raise the best variety of peaches, and the Government experts have helped save this crop, which is very important to our State. It brings in millions of dollars at a season when greatly needed. I have asked also for special appropriations and assistance in the cultivation of peanuts, tobacco, potatoes, sirup, and other important crops which are greatly aiding our farmers when they are losing so much on raising cotton. In all of these matters the western Senators from agricultural States, whether Democrats or Republicans, are in sympathy with us and give assistance. They have troubles peculiar to their agricultural section and we assist them in every way possible.

Mr. President, one of the Senators who criticized the agricultural bloc recently referred to President Wilson's act in not fixing the price of cotton when he fixed the price of wheat. Some have gone so far in their criticism of President Wilson in this matter as to charge that he favored the southern cotton farmers because the South was Democratic and because he was born in that section. There has been a great deal said on this question; but do not forget that the wheat farmers were guaranteed by Congress a large price for their crops, large or small, before they even planted, and the southern Members of Congress voted for this help to the western farmers. Most of the wheat raised is consumed in our country, but not so with cotton, as more than 60 per cent of this crop is sold to foreign countries and there had been no guaranty by Congress to the cotton planters. I have several times in the Senate referred to the great debt of our Government due the southern cotton farmers for the large amount of gold in our Treasury, largely through the export of cotton. The gold brought here to pay for our cotton has amounted to far more than both wheat and corn combined. Had we not exported the cotton raised in the South the United States Treasury would not have half the gold supply, which is now more than 40 per cent of all the gold in the world. I hope Senators will not forget this debt of gratitude the country owes the southern cotton producers when they criticize President Wilson for not fixing the price of cotton, though both Democrats and Republicans in the North and West urged him to do so.

In 1914, after war was declared in Europe, the West could ship wheat to Europe and the price more than doubled. Cotton was difficult to handle and almost impossible to ship to countries at war, which had always purchased the South's cotton. The price of cotton was just half what it formerly sold for. The South suffered financially in 1914 and 1915 more than some of the countries at war, all because there was no market for our cotton. Many southern farmers and merchants were ruined because of this condition, while the wheat farmers were comfortable in wealth. When the cotton crop was almost gathered in 1918 and cotton had advanced, there was a demand for President Wilson to fix the price, though Congress had not guaranteed the cotton farmers a certain price before planting as they had the wheat growers of the West.

Mr. Cox, a Democratic Congressman from Indiana, introduced a bill fixing the price of cotton at 15 cents a pound when it had cost the farmers at least 35 cents that year to raise it. Others urged that the price be fixed at about this price. Had Congress or President Wilson fixed the price of cotton at anything like the low price provided by Mr. Cox's bill, it would have broken the South, and wreck and ruin would have followed. The movement to fix the price in 1918 was just after the primary in which I was nominated for the Senate. When I read of this movement I came on the first train for Washington to confer with President Wilson, to call his attention to the high cost of producing cotton, and to other facts I have just enumerated, and told him it would wreck the South financially.

Mr. President, the agricultural bloc is not trying to discriminate against the East or any other section, but the western and southern Senators, members of this bloc, know that agriculture in our sections was not receiving the consideration by the Government which it deserved. We have banded together, not to get favors but simple justice. The western farmers were pioneers and their strength of character and courage developed that section, which has done so much for our country, and the sons of those brave men are not going to let partisan politics or anything else interfere with their fighting for justice with southern Democrats, also interested in agriculture.

I beg your indulgence while I relate two matters of vast importance to the South and Middle West, wherein we have been grossly discriminated against for the benefit of the East. For many years railroad rates from Ohio, Indiana, and the Middle West have been relatively cheaper to New York and the eastern ports than they have to the southeastern ports, Savannah, Brunswick, Charleston, Jacksonville, Mobile, and other cities where the expenses of loading, and so forth, are less than at New York. Two years ago I went with other southern Senators before the Interstate Commerce Commission and showed them this great injustice. We convinced the commissioners of the unjust discrimination against our section, and they granted a reduction in rates to the southeastern and Gulf ports. However, the eastern influence is now at work trying to get the commission to change these rates and go back to the old rates that gave New York a relatively lower rate and discriminated against the southeastern ports.

Not only the railroad rates through the Southeast were discriminatory, but the ocean freight rates were also. We went before the United States Shipping Board to urge them to change the ocean freight rates so as not to discriminate against the South. Ocean freight rates from New York to Cuba, Panama, South America, and the Orient through the canal, and so forth, are just the same as from Savannah, Brunswick, and other cities of the Southeast, which are 600 miles nearer to these countries than New York.

When cotton, the principal product of the South, is shipped to Liverpool and other European ports via New York freight is charged for every mile along the route to the port and overseas. I hope, Mr. President, that we may succeed in changing this discrimination in ocean freight rates from the South. It is just as important to the southern cotton producer to get cheap ocean freight rates as it is to the manufacturer of the East.

The South and West have stood such discriminations for a half century. The wonder is that an agricultural bloc was not formed sooner to get simple justice for these sections. Mr. President, you can draw a line from Baltimore to San Francisco. South of that line is half of this great country, and yet there is not a representative from that entire section on the Interstate Commerce Commission, which fixes rates on all rail transportation. Some time ago I called this to the attention of President Harding and urged that a representative of the Southeast be given one of the last two vacancies. While he did not grant my request, I shall keep the matter before him, and I am hopeful when another vacancy occurs that our section may receive its just recognition.

Some weeks ago when the President called the conference of laboring and business men to consider the unemployment situation there was no member selected from the southeast. I called this to the attention of the President and Secretary Hoover—to the injustice done our section—and they immediately appointed a representative from my State for our section of the country. I hope the President may grant recognition to our section on all governmental boards.

The agricultural bloc is responsible largely for the good-roads legislation as it recently passed Congress, which appropriated $75,000,000. Many influential Senators tried to limit this appropriation to the automobile highways, a few in a State, but the bloc fought for the improvement of all public roads, so as to give every farmer a good road to his home. If we had done nothing else for the farmers, this legislation would have benefited every farmer and business man in the agricultural States. I would have felt that our defeat in this cause would have been a calamity.

The agricultural bloc has not only been interested in legislation but have given their attention to departmental matters where the farmers were interested. The farm loan bank legislation, passed under the Wilson administration, loans money to farmers at cheaper interest rates and on longer terms than any loan company, and the farmers were borrowing money from these banks instead of paying a high rate of interest to the private loan companies. The loan companies attacked the legality of the act so as to stop these banks lending the farmers. For nearly a year these farm loan banks were stopped from making loans or selling their bonds to get money on which to make loans. I introduced a bill for the Secretary of the Treasury to buy $200,000,000 of these bonds last year, so as to provide this additional amount for the farmers. An amendment was introduced requiring the War Finance Corporation to buy the same amount provided in my bill. I supported it and the agricultural bloc secured the passage of this appropriation through the Senate.

Some months ago there was much complaint in my State from farmers who had applied for these loans on account of the delay in making loans. I had many times urged the Farm Loan Board to appoint more appraisers so as to avoid delay in making loans to farmers who had applied, and had all their plans made in the belief they would get the loans. I do not think the system has measured up to what it should be.

At one of the meetings of the agricultural bloc I took up the matter of delay and found that many other Senators had also received complaints. I urged these members of the bloc to notify the Farm Loan Board as to actual conditions and urge the Farm Loan Board to hurry up loans to the farmers. I was appointed chairman of the committee, representing the agricultural bloc, to see the board and present to them the distressed condition of farmers wishing loans. They had lost so much on 1920–21 crops as to make it necessary to place mortgages on their lands, and they wished to get money with the cheap interest rates from the Farm Loan Board. Our committee conferred with the board, and I am sure it helped expedite these loans, but I think there is still much room for improvement.

A tariff bill has passed the House and is now before the Senate Finance Committee. Strange to say, this measure begins taxing the farmer before his crop comes out of the ground, a tax on potash, his fertilizer, and unless the Republican members of the agricultural bloc vote with the Democrats, who are opposed to this tax on potash, it will become the law. Every financial statement, even those from Wall Street, given out at the beginning of the year told how much more agriculture had suffered than other lines; that the farmers' lack of purchasing power had hurt all business, yet, in the very face of all this, the Republicans begin taxing potash for fertilizer use. Such injustice and shortsightedness is almost unbelievable.

It is easy to understand why an agricultural bloc is absolutely necessary for the farmers' self-preservation on which the country's prosperity depends. The tax on potash would come out of the farmer. This tax would make his fertilizer cost him several dollars more for each ton, an awful and unnecessary burden.

Everyone concedes that the farmers have suffered more than those engaged in any other occupation. One-half our soldiers of the World War were young men from the farms. It was a terrible sacrifice for their parents and wives to give up these splendid young men, the very flower of our land, but it was harder on them to return home and find their loved ones, who had worked hard and made such sacrifice, without labor and with crops they had raised selling for less than it cost to produce. These brave soldier boys risked their lives. Their pay was hardly anything, while those who remained at home were profiteering and making high salaries. Mr. President, these young men should be given the adjusted compensation they are asking. Practically all the Democrats voted to give it to them. We are still fighting for justice for these soldiers, and I hope the Republicans will not longer continue to delay this legislation. Mr. President, if Senators had visited the battle fields just after the armistice, as I did, and could have seen what they had endured, they would not longer deny these men the little they are asking.

When the armistice was signed hundreds of parents, sisters, and wives of soldiers in France begged me to get their loved ones home—some of them to go to school, others to the farms or factories. My heart was touched when I read those appeals. I decided it was as little as I could do to take those letters and go, at my own expense, to France to Gen. Pershing's headquarters and urge him to let these men go home. I am glad to say that I was shown every courtesy, and my request was granted in nearly every instance. I am, so far as I know, the only Senator who went to this expense and service for the soldiers.

Mr. President, as long as I am a Member of the Senate, regardless of criticism, I shall do everything I can to help these young men who served our country. Congress has not done its duty by them. A great injustice was about to be done the soldier boys of my State and section. A bill passed the House, over the opposition of all the members from my section, which provided for hospitals for the soldiers, and the wording of the bill deprived Georgia and the Southeast from having one of these hospitals. When the bill came to the Senate I called to the attention of Senators the injustice done my State and section, as well as others, and we amended the House bill so as to prevent this discrimination. When the committee was appointed to select sites they looked for the most desirable locations and selected Augusta, Ga., for one of them under the provisions of the bill. As it came from the House, Augusta and the Southeast could not have had one of these hospitals.

Sometimes Congress and the departments discriminate against a section without intending it, and at other times political pressure brings it about. An instance of this was when the headquarters of the Army for the Southeast were located at Charleston, S. C. One of the first things I did after becoming a Member of the Senate was to urge the War Department to move the headquarters to Atlanta, Ga., which every Army officer knew was the logical place because of its location and railroad facilities.

Mr. President, business conditions can not improve until the farmers can sell their products at a profit. Congress should pass this measure giving agriculture representation on the Federal Reserve Board, and adopt my amendment requiring the same discount rates of the regional banks. This will be most helpful to the entire country and will encourage the farmer whose burdens are almost unbearable.

Mr. President, after I introduced my amendment the governor of the Federal Reserve Board gave out a statement which the Associated Press carried. It was in the Washington Post and other papers. It is a short statement. I ask that it be placed in the RECORD with a letter I wrote the governor asking for a statement of the amount they had spent on these different bank buildings, how much they contemplated spending, and the rental of those bank buildings occupied before the new buildings were constructed. I should like to have the reply of the governor, with one or two other letters, published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURSUM in the chair). Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HALT BUILDING WORK OF RESERVE BANKS.

WASHINGTON, January 5, 1922.

Suspension of all building construction by Federal reserve banks was ordered by Gov. W. P. G. Harding to-day, pending action by Congress.

A recent amendment offered by Senator HARRIS, of Georgia, provided that the Federal Reserve Board should be deprived of authority to authorize construction of buildings of any character without the consent of Congress.

In a letter to Senator GEORGE P. MCLEAN, chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, Gov. Harding to-day states that the chairman of each Federal reserve bank has been ordered to cease all building work by the banks until Congress has authorized such construction.

A large amount of construction will be halted by the order. It will halt the building of new Federal reserve banks in Atlanta, Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, and Minneapolis. Gov. Harding states in his letter that contracts have been let for construction of buildings for the Federal reserve banks in New York and Cleveland which can not now be canceled and the work of construction must accordingly proceed.

Building operations on many branch banks of the Federal reserve systems also will be temporarily held up by the order, which will remain in effect until Congress specifically authorizes resumption of construction.

[From the Washington Post of Jan. 6, 1922.]

CALLS HALT IN RESERVE BANK BUILDING PROGRAM—GOV. HARDING ORDERS CHAIRMEN TO AWAIT OUTCOME OF LEGISLATION.

Chairmen of all Federal reserve banks were advised yesterday by Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, to stop all construction work for which contracts have not yet been let, pending the outcome of legislation before Congress to require congressional authorization for building operations by Federal reserve banks.

This action, Gov. Harding said, will stop building operations planned in St. Louis, Minneapolis, Cincinnati, Baltimore, Nashville, Jacksonville, Detroit, Louisville, Denver, Oklahoma City, and Salt Lake City.

Action of the board in stopping proposed building operations was conveyed to the 12 chairmen of the reserve banks by Gov. Harding in a letter made public yesterday which called attention to the amendment to the Federal reserve act proposed by Senator HARRIS (Democrat), of Georgia, which would forbid the Federal Reserve Board to erect any building without the express consent of Congress.

Gov. Harding explained, however, that the action of the board would not affect building contracts already let for construction by reserve banks in various districts.

Gov. Harding also made public a letter from Secretary Hoover to the board, calling attention to the recommendation of the national conference on unemployment that all Federal agencies and Federal reserve boards should expedite as far as possible public works in an effort to provide work.

In reply to Mr. Hoover, Gov. Harding stated that the reserve banks' building program would have to await the action of Congress upon the proposed regulatory legislation.

JANUARY 6, 1922.

The FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I note in press dispatches of this date that your board is reported to have stopped all plans for your program of building reserve bank houses in various cities, in view of an amendment offered by me to bill S. 2263, providing that Congress shall give authority hereafter before buildings are constructed.

I would thank you very much to let me have the following information:

(1) The amount of cost for each building already completed; how the contracts were given; whether competitive bids were asked, or whether any work was done on the cost-plus basis.

(2) The amount of rent paid for buildings in each place where the new buildings were constructed.

(3) The expected cost of each building now under construction, or for which plans have been made, or contracts let, or for buildings contemplated.

(4) The amount of cost of furniture and fixtures for each of the buildings already completed, and information as to how contracts for such furniture and fixtures were given; that is, if by competitive bids or otherwise.

(5) The cost of building occupied and the amount of rent being paid for each building now being rented or otherwise occupied by the system which buildings are not owned by the banks, and the number of employees at work in each of these rented buildings. In this connection I desire to know the amount of rent for buildings now occupied in the cities of St. Louis, Minneapolis, Cincinnati, Baltimore, Nashville, Jacksonville, Detroit, Louisville, Denver, Oklahoma City, and Salt Lake City, as these are mentioned in the press dispatches referred to as being places where you have held up plans.

(6) The number of employees in each bank.

As I wish this information in connection with pending legislation in the Senate, I shall appreciate the earliest attention possible.

With high esteem, I am,
Very sincerely, yours,

WM. J. HARRIS.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, January 11, 1922.

DEAR SIR: It has been impossible to make an earlier reply to your letter of January 6 owing to the difficulty of getting information regarding the cost of the buildings in which Federal reserve banks and branches are occupying rented quarters. While some of the Federal reserve banks have been able to submit figures showing the cost or present value of buildings in which they occupy space others have not been able to get this information, and it seems in any event that these figures would be of no practical value for the reason that the banks or branches occupy only a portion of the rented buildings.

You will remember that some years ago the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta occupied quarters in the Hurt Building, but as it leased only the ground floor and the mezzanine a statement of the cost of the building, even if the owners were willing to give it, would not be pertinent to the survey you have in mind. Therefore, unless you especially desire it, the information, which in some cases was given by the owners in confidence, will not be transmitted.

I transmit herewith a tabular statement showing the total cost on December 31, 1921, of bank premises at each Federal reserve bank and branch and, in all cases where it is possible to make an estimate, the estimated cost (including land and vaults, but excluding furniture, fixtures, and equipment) of buildings when completed.

I inclose also a memorandum describing the property purchased by each Federal reserve bank and branch, showing the amount of rent paid for quarters now occupied or occupied before the construction of the bank's own building, and giving the number of officers and employees at each bank and branch, together with the cost of additional furniture, fixtures, and equipment for new buildings.

The figures representing total cost of bank premises to December 31, 1921, exclusive of furniture and fixtures, include miscellaneous charges not directly connected with the construction of bank buildings, such as tearing down old buildings, cancellation of leases, and other preliminary expenses. These charges have been included in order to show the total investments which have been made in connection with building operations.

The following table shows the basis on which contracts were awarded for the construction or remodeling of bank buildings which have been or are nearly completed:

	Competitive basis (per cent).	Cost-plus basis (per cent).
New York (Annex building)	88	[3] 12
Philadelphia	[1] 61	[1] 31
Pittsburgh	[2] 55
Richmond	100
Atlanta	100
Helena	48	52
Kansas City	80	20
Omaha	100
Dallas	100
El Paso	100

[1] Approximate. Balance of 8 per cent represents largely cost of vault purchased from clearing house association.

[2] Represents total cost of construction ($244,417), other than vault doors, lowering platform and chests which cost approximately $204,000. The contract for the latter work was let on a noncompetitive basis owing to congestion of work in vault construction factories and consequent impracticability of having work completed within a reasonable time.

[3] Cost plus fixed commission.

Practically all contracts in connection with buildings now under construction have been let on a competitive basis. All banks or branches, except the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia and the Helena branch, report that furniture and fixtures have been purchased on a competitive basis. In the case of the Helena branch furniture was purchased on a competitive basis, while fixtures were not.

With regard to the estimated cost of completing buildings now under construction, it is proper to state that the continued decline in prices will very probably bring the actual cost of construction materially below the estimates submitted. For instance, contracts let so far by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York show a saving of 23 per cent on the original estimate and it is reasonable to assume that in a falling market there will be further savings. This matter was discussed in the board's reply to Senate resolution 153.

Not only have competitive bids been secured from producers of the same class of materials, but in at least one case a material which had not been contemplated has been used because of the lower price at which it was offered. I refer to the Georgia marble from the quarries at Nelson, Ga., which is being used on the exterior of the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland and which is being furnished at a lower cost than Bedford limestone from near-by quarries in Indiana was offered.

In connection with the rental costs shown it is proper to state that in some cases the buildings are not fireproof and are antiquated, and in others contracts were made some years ago when rentals were on a much more lower level than they are at present. In many cases if leases had to be renewed the banks or branches would be obliged to pay double the amount of their present rentals.

In order to give you information as to the status of building operations in each Federal reserve district I inclose a table showing the progress at each bank and branch as of December 31, 1921.

Trusting that this will give you the information desired, I am,

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

THE INTERSTATE TRUST CO.,
Denver, Colo., January 11, 1922.

Mr. W. J. HARRIS,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am inclosing herewith copy of a letter I have just written to Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, and also copy of a letter I have addressed to Senators PHIPPS and NICHOLSON, from Colorado. I believe these letters will explain the Denver situation without any further remarks from me. If you wish any further information, which I doubt, as you are not interested in any one particular locality in your desire to curtail the superauthority of the Federal reserve banks, I will be very glad to furnish such information as you may ask for.

As a general proposition, however, I wish to indorse what I understand to be the purpose of a bill you have introduced in the United States Senate. If I am correctly informed, this bill attempts to place at least a joint control over the money earned by the Federal reserve banks in which the Government has a direct interest under the law in Congress itself. As a matter of fact, the Federal reserve banks should not be allowed under any circumstances to spend the money of the Government without the Government's consent, and your logic is certainly sound. It has been well understood among banks throughout the country that the Federal reserve banks were spending money like drunken sailors in erecting new buildings on most extravagant scales in order to use up the extraordinary earnings of these banks and not be obliged to turn the same into the Government Treasury. The business of the Government in the matter of public buildings should not be delegated but be under the direct supervision of Congress. Of this there can be no doubt or argument. There may be cases where there is need for Federal reserve bank buildings, but, if so, Congress can just as well provide it as to have the bank boards provide it. Certainly there is no such need existing here in Denver at the present time.

Yours, very truly,

F. N. BRIGGS, President.

FINANCIAL AFFAIRS OF EUROPEAN STATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, may I renew my request for unanimous consent for consideration and a vote upon the resolution submitted by me this morning? I think there is no objection whatever to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to make some inquiries with a view of reaching some understanding, if possible, about the bill that is to be taken up to-morrow at 1 o'clock under the five-minute rule—the amendment of the Federal reserve act. Is it the intention to go on with the calendar all day to-day? Can we not make an arrangement by which that bill will be taken up and laid before the Senate to-day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be taken up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understood that the calendar would be taken up, because under the rules this is Calendar Monday, unless set aside. Then, too, it was understood that the Senator from Iowa wanted an early executive session. It has been suggested that we go on to-day with the calendar and with the executive session, and that when we return to legislative session we take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning to give more time for discussion of the bill to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. NORRIS. I am satisfied that there are quite a number of Senators who desire to speak on that bill, and they will not be able to make their remarks under the five-minute rule. For that reason it seems to me we ought to take it up to-day.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator that we have been through the calendar two or three times lately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be laid before the Senate at 2 o'clock. There will be unlimited time for discussion then unless the time of the Senate is otherwise taken up by consent.

Mr. CURTIS. I was going to suggest that because of the fact that we have gone through the calendar several times lately it might be possible to get unanimous consent to dispense with the call of the calendar and go on with that bill this afternoon. That will be entirely satisfactory as far as I am concerned.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I submit that the discussion between the two Senators could continue in a moment if they were willing to let the Senate vote upon the resolution which I have submitted, and to which I conceive there is no possible objection. It calls for information which the American people want.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not heard the Senator's resolution. I am not disposed to object.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the resolution about?

Mr. McCORMICK. Let the resolution be read again, if any Senator wishes to hear it read a third time, for his information. It will take only a moment.

Mr. DIAL. I have no objection to the resolution, but I want to go on with the calendar when the resolution is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us hear it read.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let it be read again.

The reading clerk again read the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and hereby is, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to lay before the Senate such information regarding the revenues, expenditures, and deficits of the European States as may be available to the Department of State, showing for the last and current fiscal years especially the annual cost of land armaments in the several States, as compared with the annual deficits of the several States (including both "ordinary" and "extraordinary" expenditures) and the sum of the interest annually due from the several States on account of the loans made to them by the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator form Nebraska?

PREFERENCE RIGHTS OF ENTRY.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire at this time to ask for the consideration of House joint resolution 30, to amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution giving to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines a preferred right of homestead entry," approved February 14, 1920. The Department of the Interior are very anxious that the joint resolution should be passed. It has already passed the House, and it simply gives marines who served in the World War a 60-day preferential homestead right on the opening of public or Indian lands to entry or the restoration to entry of public lands theretofore withdrawn from entry. I have received a great many letters asking that the joint resolution be passed, and I was instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to make a favorable report on it. So the joint resolution is on the calendar, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution giving to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines a preferred right of homestead entry," approved February 14, 1920, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That hereafter, for the period of 10 years following the passage of this act, on the opening of public or Indian lands to entry, or the restoration to entry of public lands theretofore withdrawn from entry, such opening or restoration shall, in the order therefor, provide for a period of not less than 90 days before the general opening of such lands to disposal in which officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines who have served in the Army or Navy of the United States in the war with Germany and been honorably separated or discharged therefrom or placed in the Regular Army or Naval Reserve shall have a preferred right of entry under the homestead or desert land laws, if qualified thereunder, except as against prior existing valid settlement rights and as against preference rights conferred by existing laws or equitable claims subject to allowance and confirmation: Provided, That the rights and benefits conferred by this act shall not extend to any person who, having been drafted for service under the provisions of the selective service act, shall have refused to render such service or to wear the uniform of such service of the United States."

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make any and all regulations necessary to carry into full force and effect the provisions hereof.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator from Utah State briefly what the object of the joint resolution is?

Mr. SMOOT. The object is to extend the time for World War veterans to enter public or Indian lands.

Mr. FLETCHER. It does not modify the resolution approved February 14, 1920, beyond extending the time?

Mr. SMOOT. That is all it would do.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, we are all anxious to dispose of the unfinished business, and while I would like to get action on a case on the calendar, yet I will not interpose any objection to our taking up the unfinished business at this time. When that is disposed of I hope we can then consider the bills on the calendar.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether amendments will be considered to-day?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is pending now an amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. KING. Was it understood that amendments were not to be voted on until to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding of the Chair is that amendments will not be voted on until to-morrow.

Mr. KING. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] announced that he wanted this bill brought up for discussion, and also that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] said he desired to discuss the measure.

Those Senators are not now in the Chamber.

Mr. KING. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

HAZZEL ISLAND SHIPPING STATION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, when we reached Order of Business 171 on the calendar at a previous time I asked that it go over in order that I might get some additional information. It is a bill (S. 1771) authorizing the Shipping Board to acquire a site on Hazzell Island, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands. I have the information I desire and I had hoped I would be able to have the bill passed this morning. It is rather important.

Let me state briefly the situation. In 1919 the Shipping Board entered into negotiations with the owners of some land there for a site upon which to place oil tanks. They did not reach any agreement, but went into possession of the land on a verbal understanding that terms would be adjusted thereafter. We have expended about $210,000 in putting up oil tanks on the land. We have not been able to make any lease. The owners want $500 an acre rental and that is considered by some of the authorities down there at least twice what it ought to be. The purpose of the bill is to authorize the Shipping Board to purchase or condemn the 14 acres that are necessary. We have never paid the people anything, either rental or otherwise.

Mr. KING. Will so many acres be required?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; the 14 acres are required. It is simply a question whether or not we shall acquire this land upon which we have put up these tanks at expense of $210,000, or vacate the land. We have a right, or at least it is thought we have the right, to take down the tanks and move them, but that will probably cost more than the land is worth.

The purpose of the measure is to authorize the Shipping Board to acquire the land. With that statement I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of considering the bill to which I have referred. Of course, if there is objection, I shall not insist on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1771.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether it is the purpose to keep the unfinished business before the Senate during the entire afternoon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Montana that the unfinished business is now before the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My inquiry is whether it is the purpose of those in charge of the bill to keep the matter before the Senate and to debate it this afternoon or not?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know who has charge of the bill, but probably the Senator from Connecticut has.

Mr. McLEAN. I prefer that the Senator from Nebraska should take charge of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I certainly do not have charge of it, but it was my intention when I asked that it be laid before the Senate that it be kept before the Senate until disposed of, because I realize a great many Senators desire to talk on the question. It is quite an important piece of legislation, and to-morrow the 5-minute rule goes into effect. It seemed, therefore, almost essential that we should take it up now and that it be debated this afternoon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no disposition to attempt to displace it at all. I merely inquired so as to be advised what the situation is.

Mr. NORRIS. In regard to the request of the Senator from Washington, I am willing to consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside provided that his bill does not consume any time and with the understanding that the right is reserved to object at any time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. NORRIS. With that understanding, I make no objection to the request of the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill S. 1771. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator whether it will lead to any debate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope not. If it does, I shall withdraw the request. I have made all the statement that I care to make with reference to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to provide a site for a fuel and fuel-oil station and fresh-water reservoir for Shipping Board and other merchant vessels, as well as United States naval vessels, and for other purposes, the United States, through the United States Shipping Board, is hereby empowered to acquire the land on Hazzell Island, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, necessary in the opinion of the Shipping Board for the purposes aforesaid, and authority is hereby given the Shipping Board to pay for said land out of any of its funds a sum of money not exceeding $50,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, although with the limited information which I have I do not feel like supporting it. Until we have further information concerning the Shipping Board and the possibilities of its successful operation, I am reluctant to support any measure which calls for further appropriations in its behalf. Its past history has been discreditable and its present activities have not brought any great assurance that a policy or program has been found which will bring satisfactory results. I am not in this statement making any criticism of the present organization, because I know of the difficulties which they have to encounter. I think there is a disposition to suspend judgment until a fair opportunity is offered the present administration to inaugurate reforms and bring about results which warrant the enormous appropriations which are being made. However, I can see no success for the Shipping Board or for governmental operation of any part of our merchant marine, and I believe that millions will be lost annually in this futile undertaking if it shall be persisted in.

I take this opportunity to call the attention of the Senate to the activity of Mr. Lasker in seeking to prepare the mind of the public for a ship subsidy. We are advised by the press that Mr. Lasker is making speeches in important eastern cities in favor of a policy calling for appropriations from the Treasury of the United States in the shape of subsidies for the merchant marine of the United States, or, at least, for the ships owned and operated by the Government. I saw in one paper that Mr. Lasker had announced that the President of the United States would soon recommend to Congress a subsidy for our merchant marine. My information is that other persons connected with the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation are engaged in similar propaganda.

Mr. President, the departments of our Government are separate. The legislative is separate from the executive, and the executive from the judiciary. Each branch of the Government has a restricted and limited field in which it may operate. It is not a part of the executive branch of the Government to enact laws or to formulate legislative plans and propagandize the country for the enactment into law of such plans.

The executive department executes the law. It is the duty of officials charged with the administration of our laws to perform those duties and not to transcend the legitimate boundaries by which they are circumscribed. Unfortunately a policy has grown up which is tolerated, if not justified, under which officials in the executive branch of the Government devote a portion of their time in advocacy of legislation which they deem to be important. It is needless to remark that legislation so advocated usually relates to the particular agencies of the Government with which they are identified and would increase either the power and authority of such advocates or augment their emoluments.

It is a common practice for persons connected with executive departments and agencies to visit various parts of the country at the expense of the Government and deliver addresses in behalf of measures which they desire to see enacted into law. This means that individuals who should be giving their attention to the work which they are paid to perform in executive departments are spending a part of their time in traveling throughout the country advocating schemes and plans and policies and legislation for their benefit and for the aggrandizement of the Federal instrumentalities with which they are identified. Thus executive agencies of the Government dissipate their energies which should be wholly devoted to their particular work in great political activities throughout the country. I say "political activities" because much of the propaganda carried on by these executive officials is of a political character. It relates to political questions and governmental policies, to party activities, and to economic, industrial, and political questions which provoke wide differences of opinion. Both political parties are guilty of these improprieties to which I am referring. Under the Wilson administration persons in executive branches of the Government sought to promote legislation. They visited various parts of the United States and endeavored to develop public sentiment in behalf of measures which they wished Congress to enact into law.

Upon a number of occasions I criticized their activities and condemned executive agencies and instrumentalities of the Government for what I conceived to be palpable transgressions. Under the present administration the same course is pursued, perhaps with greater vigor. I repeat, the executive and the legislative departments must be kept separate; it is not the duty of executive agencies of the Government to devote their attention for the purpose of securing legislation or creating public sentiment in behalf of measures and policies which officials in the executive departments of the Government desire to see enacted and adopted.

I protest against heads of bureaus and other Federal executive organizations spending their time in proselyting among the people and engaging in Nation-wide propaganda aimed at the creation of a public demand for the enactment of laws, particularly such as would enhance the prestige and extend the authority and power of these executive missionaries. If it becomes necessary that men are to be paid to deliver speeches and carry on campaigns to develop public sentiment in behalf of domestic or national policies and national legislation, then Congress can make the necessary appropriations to employ suitable and competent persons to perform this work. Until that is done, I submit that it will be in the interest of the public welfare if the officials in the executive branch of the Government will look after the enforcement of the law and the performance of the duties devolved upon them by law.

Congress has not employed individuals to advocate ship subsidies. There are millions of people in the United States who are opposed to subsidies and they will be unwilling that executive officials of the Government shall give their time in advocacy of policies which they believe to be inimical to the public welfare. If Congress desires the views of executive officials, there is a way by which these views may be obtained. If the President of the United States desires the views of bureau chiefs or heads of departments, or any persons employed in the executive service of the Government, he will ask for the submission of their views.

I think that the time has arrived when there should be a check to this indiscriminate and persistent propaganda carried on by persons within executive branches of the Government. If those charged with the important duties of administering the law and executing the policies of the Government faithfully perform the obligations resting upon them, they will be rendering a great service to the country.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there are several amendments pending, which will be taken up, I presume, when we reach the bill under the 5-minute rule, and there are several substitutes, as well as substitutes for substitutes.

To my mind, the bill has been given an importance vastly beyond what it deserves. I do not think anything will be accomplished by it, even if the bill and all of its amendments and all of its substitutes should become law, and yet I am in entire sympathy with what the bill or those who are behind the bill and the amendments are trying to accomplish. They want to get more consideration for agriculture. They feel that agriculture has not been treated fairly. I agree with both of those propositions. So it has been proposed to introduce a bill which will provide that a farmer shall be placed on the Federal Reserve Board, a man who is a really, truly, dirt farmer, as is said.

The farmers of the country have been given to understand that they are going to get great relief by the passage of the bill and get representation on the Federal Reserve Board. They are going to be fooled again. There will be no relief any more than there is now so far as the Federal Reserve Board is concerned. After all, we can not by a legislative act take away the discretion that is vested in the appointing power. Under the law as it stands now the President can appoint all farmers, practically, with the exception of two—yes; he could get all farmers as members of the Federal Reserve Board if he desired.

If we enact a law that will say in so many words that he must appoint one farmer, he can comply with the law and appoint a farmer who will be the worst enemy that the farmers ever had on the board. There is no doubt about that.

The President without any change in the law can appoint a man who is not a farmer who will be the best friend that the farmers have when he gets on the board. In other words, it will not be difficult to go out and pick a farmer or a lawyer or a preacher or a banker or a manufacturer and get a man who will be fundamentally, from the bottom of his heart, out of sympathy with the particular line of business with which he is identified and classified.

It is said we will have a farmer on the Federal Reserve Board, and after that everybody in agriculture will prosper. But, Mr. President, the appointing power could select a farmer who is more reactionary than any Wall Street banker that ever lived, if he wants to do that. There are plenty of them whom he could get. On the other hand, without having the law designate that a farmer must be appointed, the President could appoint somebody who is a farmer, who is a lawyer, who is a preacher, who is a manufacturer, and by that very act appoint somebody who is in entire sympathy with agriculture and would comply entirely with those conditions that those who are favorable to assistance to agriculture would desire.

So, after all, in my judgment it is nothing but camouflage; and, while I may probably vote for some of the proposed substitutes, so far as I am concerned I shall do so more as a protest against the action of the Federal Reserve Board in the last two or three years than for any other reason. I myself think the Federal Reserve Board deserves criticism, and I think the feeling that it deserves criticism has brought about the sentiment which is behind this bill. Yet the bill itself can not directly accomplish anything.

I received a telegram the other day from an organization of bankers—and I have wondered if other Senators were getting the same kind of telegrams—in regard to the great buildings which are being constructed by Federal reserve banks. I wish I had that telegram here, for I should like to read it to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from Nebraska that not only are Senators receiving telegrams of the character to which he has referred, but those telegrams are being inspired by men who are connected with the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator from Georgia a copy of one of those telegrams? I wonder if the telegrams he has received are the same as that which I have received?

Mr. HARRIS. I have not at hand one of those telegrams, though I have some in my office. The governor of the Federal Reserve Board has stated that the construction of bank buildings has been stopped, but, as I understand, in no case has construction been stopped where the buildings had been contracted for or work already begun. However, the statement which the Associated Press carried led people to believe that the work on many new buildings was being stopped in the cities mentioned. I have placed in the RECORD the article from the Washington Post in which Gov. Harding gave out the statement, and from every one of the cities mentioned by him there are being sent telegrams to Senators, with the idea of defeating this legislation. There is a propaganda going on all over the country against the legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. The telegram to which I have reference does not apply to the pending bill itself, but it applies to the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Georgia. The effect of the proposed amendment, as I understand—and if I do not state it correctly I desire to be corrected by the Senator—would be that the Federal reserve banks would not be allowed to erect buildings unless specifically authorized to do so by Congress.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator has correctly stated the object of my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. It is the amendment of the Senator from Georgia against which the telegrams protest. I have wondered whether the propaganda is general and whether other Senators are receiving telegrams from banks and associations which oppose that amendment; and if so, whether the propaganda originated with the Federal Reserve Board here in Washington or whether bankers understand each other so well that they know when they ought to telegraph their Senators without being told.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Nebraska?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that as a result of some matters which have been brought to my attention I believe that there is no institution is this country to-day which is carrying on so systematic a propaganda to secure or defeat legislation which it may want or may not want as is the Federal Reserve Board. The propaganda of that board is one that is easily made effective.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course.

Mr. SIMMONS. That board communicates, first, with the Federal reserve banks; the Federal reverse banks obey instructions and communicate with the member banks; and so the whole banking system of the United States is brought into cooperation to carry out the legislative purposes of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. HARRIS. May I interrupt the Senator from Nebraska for just a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. The Federal Reserve Board are not only bringing the banks into this propaganda, but telegrams are being sent by contractors and those who are furnishing materials for the construction of these buildings.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is not any question that the Federal Reserve Board is better equipped than is any other institution in the world to inaugurate a propaganda which will have behind it a wonderful power. I am not saying that they are doing so, but the telegram which I have received—and I have sent for it and if it reaches me before I get through I shall read it to the Senate—seems to me to indicate on its face that the men who sent it did not understand the situation, for they telegraph their Senators and say, "We are opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia; we think that Federal reserve banks ought to be left unrestrained to build as they please, where they please, and when they please, and that that matter ought not be the subject of congressional legislation."

As I understand the situation, Mr. President, to begin with there is quite a sentiment that there are too many Federal reserve districts in the United States. I myself think there are. If the present or a future Congress should reduce the number of those districts to one or to two or to three or to six, or whatever other number might be decided upon, the Federal reserve system would have many buildings on hand which would be almost useless, especially if they were constructed on the grand scale which is contemplated in some instances.

In the next place, the money which is being used by the Federal reserve banks to construct palaces is not their money. It has come out of the borrowing public. The men and women who have been compelled to borrow money have been obliged to pay a rate of interest sufficiently high to make the enormous profit which has come into the hands of the Federal reserve banks, a profit that was never contemplated by those who passed the act, a profit that is so great that it staggers the imagination. When we realize that one of the reserve banks is now contemplating the construction of a bank building that will cost $26,000,000 out of money which has been contributed by the poor people, by those who are engaged in business and agriculture, who have been compelled to borrow, then I think we shall come to somewhat of an understanding of what is proposed by this building program and somewhat of an understanding of the extravagance which pervades the whole system.

Mr. President, it is not only in the building program that extravagance is shown. I am not speaking as an enemy of the Federal reserve system; but great profits like those which have been made by the system tend toward extravagance in any line of business, and the Federal reserve banking system is no exception. In their effort to coerce State banks into cashing checks at par—and, so far as the object itself is concerned, I am entirely in sympathy with it and should like to see it realized, but I should like to see it done legally and without the method of the highwayman being practiced—they have certainly been as extravagant as it is possible to be, and have spent money like drunken sailors and without any regard to its value. The building program is another step in the direction of extravagance, involving, as it does, the erection of the most expensive structure that has ever been built in the history of the world, a structure which is to be used for the convenience and luxury of the officers and employees of the Federal reserve system out of the money of some one else, not one cent of which is theirs. If a man has money and wants to construct a building that will cost $26,000,000, it is his own business, but when, as trustee, he undertakes to make such an expenditure with the money of some one else, particularly of men who have not paid it voluntarily, but who have been compelled to pay it when they have borrowed money at the bank, he ought to be careful. If he is not careful, if he does not show any more regard for his trusteeship than some of the Federal reserve system officials are showing with this money that has come into their hands, then there ought to be some control placed over him. So in this case there ought to be legislation of Congress that will control the funds and profits of the Federal reserve system. I am not only in favor of stopping the Federal Reserve Board where they have not commenced, but I should be glad to stop them where they have commenced, if they have any such extravagant program as has been indicated.

I want Senators to remember that the men who have contributed the money that goes to make up this fund are poor people, who have been compelled to borrow money either to carry on their farms, to raise food to feed the soldiers and to feed the people, or else they are business men or those engaged in the manufacturing of food after the farmer has produced it. They are the great borrowers of the country. They have borrowed money at the banks, and they have been charged a rate of interest sufficiently high to make the enormous profits received by the Federal reserve banks, and those now in control of those profits propose to use them now in the erection of mammoth buildings.

When the people throughout the country who have contributed the money, who by their toil and their sacrifices have made this great fund possible, read such a description as I have read of at least one of these buildings, and begin to realize what has become of the fruits of their sweat and of their toil, I fear they will feel almost like inaugurating a revolution. It seems to me the Congress can not afford to remain silent and permit such things to go on even though buildings have been commenced.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in many places throughout the country the public service needs buildings, but for several years Congress has provided no appropriation for that purpose. Inasmuch as the profits of the Federal reserve system in excess of 6 per cent belong to the Government of the United States, would it not be far better to expend $26,000,000 in erecting throughout the country the necessary public buildings than to concentrate it all in one Federal reserve bank building?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Federal reserve banks have spent more money for buildings than has been appropriated and spent under authority of Congress for public buildings throughout the country under any omnibus public buildings bill. The Federal reserve banks have expended $71,000,000 for public buildings, whereas the largest public building bill making provision for the erection of post-office buildings, customhouses, and other buildings in all the States of the Union has not appropriated that much money.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Capitol of the United States sinks into insignificance when compared to the bank building which the Federal Reserve Bank of New York proposes to erect; the Capitol of the United States, together with the Senate Office Building and the House Office Building thrown in, is only a drop in the bucket.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me first refer to the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from New Mexico asked me whether or not I thought it would be better to use this money in the erection of public buildings scattered throughout the country. I have no hesitancy in answering in the affirmative, although I am not in favor of using the profits of the Federal reserve system in that way. Mr. President, at the present time, when everybody is suffering, when most of the farmers are bankrupt, when banks are failing, when business men are losing money and manufacturing has to a great extent ceased, and labor is unemployed, when such conditions are staring us in the face, I do not believe that we ought to engage in any building program where we can posibly avoid it. If this money is not used in the erection of the great buildings that are proposed by the Federal reserve authorities, I would not be in favor of using it to construct post offices; I would rather get along without any new buildings for post offices until the people and the country are in a more prosperous condition and can afford to pay the taxes which we must levy whenever we engage in any activity of this kind. This money belongs to the United States, as a matter of fact. It was contributed by one class of people, the borrowing public, and there is a provision in the law as to what shall become of these profits. They can go toward the reduction of the public debt, the payment of Liberty bonds, and so forth, and thus stop interest and thus stop taxation to the extent that they will go, instead of resorting to the extravagant methods that are proposed in the construction of these buildings.

I now yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in a message from Hon. John Skelton Williams, former Comptroller of the Currency, he says:

> The fees to be given general contractor at New York and foundation contractor in cash largely exceed the total cost of Federal reserve bank building at St. Louis, with land upon which it stands.

Mr. NORRIS. There is an illustration of what I have been saying; and it is not the worst one, either.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to say to my friend before I take my seat that this order to stop the construction of Federal reserve banks does not extend to New York. That bank is going on to completion.

Mr. NORRIS. How far has that building progressed?

Mr. HEFLIN. Not very far. I think the foundation is about laid. That is about all, I think.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator any information as to how much the land cost upon which it is going to be built?

Mr. HEFLIN. I think in the neighborhood of $4,000,000.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I can give the Senator the information he desires.

Mr. NORRIS. All right. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. The total cost in 1919 of the property for the banking-house site, at the corner of Liberty and Nassau Streets and Maiden Lane, was $4,797,881.72. The total cost to December 31, 1921, of the new building in course of construction was $1,703,074. The estimated cost upon completion, including the cost of the land, is $19,976,368.

That is, for the building itself without furniture and fixtures. Then comes the annex.

In April and July, 1920, the properties at the corner of Gold Street and Maiden Lane and at 10 Gold Street and 89 Maiden Lane were purchased for an annex building site at a total cost of $681,531.17. The total cost, including land, was $2,136,447. The cost of furniture and fixtures was $66,730.78. The total cost of everything—the land and the buildings and the furniture and fixtures for that building—will be $27,000,000, instead of $26,000,000, as the Senator says.

Mr. NORRIS. Twenty-seven million dollars?

Mr. HARRIS. Twenty-seven million dollars, instead of $26,000,000. I am reading from a letter from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Harding.

Mr. NORRIS. He puts it at $27,000,000, as I understand. We all know that when we start to construct a building we estimate its cost at one figure, and we pay twice that when we get through with the building; so there is not any doubt that this building will probably cost $50,000,000 by the time it is finished.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. May I interrupt the Senator just to ask that the Senator from Georgia will put into the RECORD the statement from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board that the total cost of this building will be $27,000,000?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator from Georgia for that purpose if he desires to do it.

Mr. HARRIS. I had already asked permission earlier in the session to-day to place in the RECORD this letter from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board showing the cost of all buildings and the furniture and everything; and, as I added it, the total is $27,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. As the Senator added it, the total is $27,000,000. What I am trying to do just at this pertinent point is to get into the RECORD the statement from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board to the effect that the total cost of the building will be $27,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I should be glad to have that in the RECORD, and I will yield to any Senator who has the information and who will put it in.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that if he will yield for that purpose he will not continue his speech to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator means it will take too long?

Mr. GLASS. I mean that the governor of the Federal Reserve Board has never made any such statement.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be. I have no information on that subject.

Mr. GLASS. Or, at least—I will not put it that bluntly—I should be very much amazed to find that he had made any such statement.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, will the Senator from Georgia read the statement?

Mr. HARRIS. I will read the statement in full, Mr. President. This refers to the New York bank. It is from Gov. Harding and is dated January 14:

NEW YORK.

June, 1918: Purchased property for banking-house site at corner of Liberty, Nassau, and Maiden Lane.

February, June, 1919: Purchased adjoining properties running through from Liberty Street to Maiden Lane. Total cost of property purchased in 1918 and 1919, which covers 45,950 square feet, was $4,797,881.72.

Total cost to December 31, 1921, of new building in course of construction, $1,703,074; estimated cost upon completion, including cost of land, $19,976,368. Building will not be completed for about two years, and there is no basis at present on which to estimate the cost of furniture and fixtures.

April, July, 1920: Purchased for annex building site properties at corner of Gold Street and Maiden Lane and at 10 Gold Street and at 89 Maiden Lane at a total cost of $681,531.17; total cost, including land, $2,136,447; cost of furniture and fixtures, $66,730.78.

The bank occupies space on nine floors of the Equitable Building, for which an annual rental of $310,959.56 is paid, and rents various vaults at an annual cost of $28,039.25. Bank also occupies the new annex building referred to in the preceding paragraph and the Subtreasury, for which no rent is paid. The annex building is commercial in type, and was constructed with a view to its sale if not needed upon completion of the main building.

Of the 2,773 officers and employees of the bank on December 31, 1921, 2,115 were housed in the Equitable Building, 139 in the Subtreasury, and 519 in the annex building. Prior to the completion of the annex building additional space was rented at a cost of $126,092.55, providing accommodation for 576 officers and employees.

I asked Gov. Harding to give me the cost of all the buildings, and then to give me the rental paid for buildings before the buildings were erected. For instance, in San Francisco, for the building they used before going into the new building—for which they paid about four million two hundred and some odd thousand dollars, besides the furniture—they were paying a rental of $13,000 on the building formerly occupied. One per cent interest on $4,500,000 would have been three times as much as the rent they formerly paid, so they would get about one-third of 1 per cent interest on the investment in the new building compared with what they were paying before.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me to ask a question right in that connection——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield first to the Senator from Alabama, and then I will yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wanted to ask the Senator a question there. The Senator took the sums given him by Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, and added them up, and they made a total of $27,000,000? Is that it? Instead of getting a statement from him saying that the total was $27,000,000, the Senator added the figures and they came to $27,000,000?

Mr. HARRIS. With the furniture and fixtures.

Mr. NORRIS. Now I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as the Senator from Georgia read, I computed in my mind the sum total of the figures that he presented; and they could not possibly have added up more than $21,000,000, which is $6,000,000 short of the statement imputed to the governor of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator does not want to make a statement without something on which to base it. This statement says:

Estimated cost upon completion—of main building—including cost of land, $19,976,368.

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. Now as to the annex:

Purchased, for annex building site, properties at corner of Gold Street and Maiden Lane * * * at a total cost of $681,531.17; total cost, including land, $2,136,447; cost of furniture and fixtures, $66,730.78.

Mr. GLASS. That is not quite $21,000,000 so far.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; that is a little over $21,000,000.

Mr. HARRIS. It is more than $21,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. I say, about $21,000,000.

Mr. HARRIS. That does not include the furniture in the main building, and does not include furniture and fixtures.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator read the item of furniture, $66,000.

Mr. HARRIS. That is in the annex.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] finishes telling the Senator from Nebraska what he wants to say, I will go on.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Alabama was simply making a suggestion to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. GLASS. The figures presented by the Senator from Georgia, as I hastily passed them in review, aggregated a little in excess of $21,000,000. I will say to the Senator that those figures were mere estimates; and the Senator from Georgia loses sight of the fact that the ground and buildings of the annex, now owned and occupied by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, must be, in fairness, subtracted from the total of a little more than $21,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Why subtracted?

Mr. GLASS. Because the bank will abandon that annex building and sell the building and the land on which the building stands when they go into the new building. I assumed that what the Senator was trying to get at was the net cost of this building when completed.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to get at that. That was not the only object I had, of course.

Mr. GLASS. Therefore, whatever price is obtained for the present annex building and the land upon which it stands should be subtracted from the price of the new building in order to get the cost.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; if they intend to do that with the annex building, that would be the proper step to take. I admit that.

Mr. GLASS. That will be done.

I shall not take the Senator's time now. Later in the day I hope I shall have an opportunity to address the Senate on the subject of the Federal reserve bank system generally, and then I think I shall indicate with a fair degree of accuracy just what the situation is with respect to the New York bank.

Mr. NORRIS. I listened to the Senator from Virginia with a great deal of interest and profit. I do not claim to be posted as to all the details of this building program. I was shocked, however, when I have heard, and have read several times, about their program. It seemed to me that it was a program that was utterly wild, under present conditions, at least; that it was unbelievable that men who had the best interests of the country at heart would engage in a program of that kind under present conditions.

Mr. GLASS. I want to say, if I may, that I absolutely agree with the Senator from Nebraska that, if it is possible to avoid them, no building operations ought to be undertaken at this time by any branch of the Government, and if I could have my way, no building operations would be engaged in by anybody in this country until the profiteering in building material should cease.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator entirely.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, does the Senator know that in this magnificent marble temple which they are building up in New York for a banking institution they are providing swimming pools, gymnasiums, cafés, and various other things of that sort for the entertainment of the officials?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and a hospital, I understand, in addition to the other things.

Mr. OVERMAN. And an assembly hall for a thousand people.

Mr. NORRIS. And, as the Senator from North Carolina says, an assembly hall. It will really and truly be a marble palace, such as any of the kings or monarchs of ancient times, or of the present day, would envy, unlike anything that has gone before.

I have no objection to men building houses and office buildings containing billiard rooms, swimming pools, hospitals, museums, and picture galleries, if they do it with their own money, but I do not want somebody else to build one for himself with my money, and I do not want some one who, in a partial degree, at least, is an official of the Government of the United States, to build them with money belonging to the United States, unless they get direct authority to do so from the proper legislative body. It seems that on ordinary occasions and under normal conditions that would be wrong, but now it is grossly sinful.

I am not making an attack, as I fear my friend from Virginia thinks I might be guilty of, upon the Federal reserve system. I think the best friend of the system is one who criticizes it when he finds out what he believes to be wrong about it. That is what I am trying to do.

I said a while ago that the officials were getting extravagant. Perhaps it is a natural thing that they should become extravagant. Men who have thrown into their laps untold millions, without really knowing how they came or from whence they came, might naturally become extravagant, and this system, organized for the purpose of regulating the banking and the currency of the country, without any idea of making any profit, finds itself in possession of more money and greater profits than had ever come to any similar institution in the history of the world. On that account, perhaps, they became extravagant. In my judgment, they are paying extravagant and morally sinful salaries to a great many of their employees. They propose to build an office building with money belonging to the people of the United States, contributed by those who are compelled to borrow money out of banks. They are now going to use that money to build a marble palace containing swimming pools, picture galleries, moving-picture shows, hospitals, restaurants, cafés, and all kinds of parlors and institutions too numerous to mention and too expensive to even give the figures in your imagination.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, there is a remarkable fact set forth in the report they make to the Senate which may account for this extravagance about which the Senator is talking. I will read it:

> At the instance of the Federal Reserve Board a bill was introduced during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress to amend section 7 of the Federal reserve act by permitting Federal reserve banks to create a maximum surplus out of earnings equal to 100 per cent of their paid-in capital, instead of 40 per cent, as originally provided.

The surplus was 40 per cent, and they came in and got a bill through allowing them to retain 100 per cent of their net earnings.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to give the date of that act. I did not hear it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It reads:

> At the instance of the Federal Reserve Board a bill was introduced during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress to amend section 7 of the Federal reserve act by permitting Federal reserve banks to create a maximum surplus out of earnings equal to 100 per cent of their paid-in capital, instead of 40 per cent, as originally provided.

Mr. NORRIS. That illustrates how Congress has been, as a rule, following the recommendations of the Federal Reserve Board upon any legislation they might recommend in reference to the amendment of the Federal reserve act. I have been one who has always felt inclined to follow their recommendations, if I could, and sometimes we have passed acts amending the Federal reserve act without very careful consideration, because we knew they had been recommended by this board.

But we shall lose confidence in that board, and the people of the country will lose confidence in that board, if they abuse the trust which has been placed in them, as I believe they are doing in the squandering of this money. It may be that we have already gone so far and that so much has been done that we can not stop some of these things, but I think we ought to stop them; that they should not be permitted to go on. I believe the Banking and Currency Committee should make a full investigation of the entire subject, not only of salaries, but of all the expenditures of money, with a view of ascertaining just how great has been the extravagance, with a view of passing the right kind of laws in order to limit it in the future.

That is only one amendment to this bill which is pending. I think that amendment is an important one. I want to see it put on the bill. The bill itself, as I said at the beginning, is not, in my judgment, of very much importance, and what I have said about the appointing power, after all, always having the discretion in naming members of this board has no reference to any particular President. It has no reference to any particular individual who has been appointed, or anyone who has recommended any appointment. It is inherent in any law which may be passed on this subject, regardless of who the President may be. It will come up to the appointing power in the end whether he has representatives of the agricultural interest on the board or not, and to my mind we do not add anything to it when we put in the law a provision compelling the President to appoint a farmer.

I have never had much use for provisions of law which try to define the kind of a man who shall be put on a board by the appointing power. Very often when we enact laws we provide for a division between parties of the membership of boards. To my mind that is fundamentally wrong. If we enact a law which provides that a board consisting of five shall not have more than three of any one party on it we are fundamentally wrong. In the first place, assuming that a President or other appointing power wanted to carry the bill out in good faith, it limits him to such an extent that he is very often compelled to cast aside the men best fitted for the positions. If in filling an appointment of that kind now, when the Republican Party has the appointing power, there were a man who was not a Republican, who was conceded by everybody to possess qualifications that were very superior for that particular position, where there was a vacancy, the President could not appoint him, if he obeyed the law, unless the man would say that he was a Republican, and it might be some one who everybody, regardless of politics, would concede was the best-qualified man for the position in the United States.

He might have no politics. On some of these scientific boards and some financial boards there could be appointed men who have no politics whatever who would be absolutely the best who could be selected, men who had made a life study of some particular subject which fitted them and qualified them for some particular line of work. With that kind of a law the President would not be permitted to appoint them unless they would certify that they belonged to a particular political party.

Mr. President, the party in power always gets around that. It does not make any difference whether it is a Democratic or a Republican administration. When we had a Republican President, right after the Palmer-Buckner campaign, Gen. Palmer was appointed to the Civil Service Commission as a Democrat. He ran for President, and was designated a Democrat, but he did it with no other object in view than to beat the real Democratic nominee, Mr. Bryan. No doubt the expenses of his campaign were paid by the Republican committee; yet he was a Democrat, and he was appointed to fill a place of that kind. There was nothing in the world against him. I am not saying that he was not fully qualified, but I am giving that simply as an illustration to show how these laws are carried out.

So, if in a law, you say to the President, "You must appoint a man on this board who is a farmer," he can pick a man who is a farmer who has no sympathy with farmers, who has no feeling whatever for agriculture, who would be the worse reactionary he could possibly get; yet he would technically comply with the law.

I remember that when the Farm Loan Board was provided for, the law provided that only three of the members of that board could be members of one party, if there were seven; I have forgotten the number——

Mr. GLASS. Two of them.

Mr. NORRIS. I happened to be on the committee to which the appointments were referred when the appointments came in, and I was dumbfounded when the appointments came up when the Democrats of the committee who were there objected to the fellows who were nominated as Democrats. They said they were mugmumps, that they were not good Democrats. The Republicans were objecting to the fellows who were nominated as Republicans, because they said they did not vote the Republican ticket on every occasion.

Mr. OVERMAN. They claimed they were Wilsonites.

Mr. NORRIS. They were both probably right, but, as a matter of fact, this was true; everyone of them had supported President Wilson, and there you have it. He could get Republicans who had supported him and he did it. The Republicans, when they were in power and had occasion to fill places on that kind of a bipartisan board, appointed Democrats who voted the Republican ticket. As a matter of fact, nine times out of ten the law is not carried out in good faith. It is the same with the proposal to put a provision in this law that the President must appoint a farmer on this board. We have been saying to the farmers over the country that if we can get a farmer on this board, everything will be lovely. I suppose some people have even believed that wheat would go to $2 a bushel just as soon as a farmer is appointed on this board. But, Mr. President, there might now be farmers put on that board who would be the very best men available in the world. I would be glad if that were done. There might be a farmer put on who would stand for the interests of agriculture now without any change in the law, and with the change there might be a farmer appointed who would be the worst enemy to the agriculturists of the country who could possibly be gotten.

As I said, I am going to vote for some of these amendments and some of these substitutes, I do not know which, more as a protest against what is going on and the policies which have been adopted and carried on by the Federal Reserve Board than for any other reason.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

By section 9 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, the Congress expressed a desire that the International Joint Commission investigate what further improvement of the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake Ontario is necessary to make the river navigable for ocean-going vessels, together with the estimated cost thereof.

Under date of January 21, 1920, the Governments of the United States and Canada by agreement referred the matter to the International Joint Commission pursuant to the provisions of article 9 of the treaty relating to the boundary waters between the United States and Canada, signed by the United States and Great Britain on January 11, 1909.

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress and for such action as it may deem appropriate, a report, bearing date of December 19, 1921, submitted to the Department of State by a letter of the joint secretaries of the commission, dated January 6, 1922, presenting the findings, conclusions, and recommendations of the commission regarding the matter.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 16, 1922.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message, together with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask that the report be sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as the commission recommends the first step must be a treaty with Canada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is nothing to indicate what the recommendation is. The report has not been opened yet.

Mr. KELLOGG. The report does contain that clause, that a treaty should be entered into. If the Presiding Officer thinks it should be examined first, I ask that the message and accompanying papers lie on the table for the present.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I was wondering if the report ought not to be printed. It seems to me it ought to be printed at some stage of the proceedings. I do not know whether it will be printed by the committee or not. At any rate, it seems to me it ought to be printed at some time.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I think it should be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no doubt it will be printed. The question in the mind of the Chair is how much of it should be printed. There are many papers accompanying the report. The Chair at first thought it should go to the Committee on Commerce, and then that committee would determine what should be printed. The Senator from Minnesota now suggests that it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KELLOGG. If by convention or agreement we enter into a treaty to be approved by the Senate, then, of course, the actual construction of those questions would go to the Committee on Commerce, but the first place for this to go would be the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I think we had better follow the suggestion that the report lie on the table until it can be examined.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask that it may lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my attention was diverted for the moment. Am I to understand this is a report from the International Joint Boundary Commission with respect to the improvement of the St. Lawrence River?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a message from the President of the United States transmitting their report.

Mr. POMERENE. Unquestionably that report ought to be printed. It is a matter of very great importance to the entire country, even the city of New York, and I think that the Senate as a whole will be very much interested in it. I trust that it will be printed. I think as it relates to our international affairs and a treaty it perhaps should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota that the report lie on the table until Senators have had an opportunity to examine it and determine where it should be referred, and then undoubtedly the committee to which it will be referred will look after the printing.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I merely suggest that I hope we may determine it a little later in the day, so that we may have it determined to-day, because it is of very great importance that action shall be taken upon the question of the printing as soon as possible.

Mr. POMERENE. For one I should like an opportunity to examine it just as soon as it can be printed. I think other Senators feel the same way about it.

Mr. KELLOGG subsequently said: The Presiding Officer has looked at the report and is willing that it should be referred at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first recommendation of the commission is that the Governments of the United States and Canada enter into an arrangement by way of treaty, and so forth. The Chair thinks it clear that the message of the President, together with the report, should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Does the Senator desire an order made at this time with reference to the printing or to leave that to the committee?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think that probably could be left to the committee, because the number that should be printed might be more than the ordinary number.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report, together with the maps and appendices and other documents, with the message of the President, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. GLASS obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I have looked up the statement of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, which earlier in the day I had asked be placed in the RECORD, and I find that I was in error in adding up the figures in the cost of the New York building, furniture, and fixtures. I wish now to give them in the exact amount, and I am reading the figures from the governor's letter.

The large building and land alone cost $19,976,368. The building and land for the annex cost $2,136,447; furniture for the annex cost $66,730.78; making a total of $22,179,546.78. However, that does not include the furniture and fixtures for them, which will make it run up to about $23,000,000. The rental they are now paying in New York is $338,999.81. That would be 1½ per cent on the investment. The San Francisco building cost more than $4,000,000. They had paid rental of only $13,000 per annum for the building they formerly occupied, which amounts to less than one-half of 1 per cent on the cost of the new building.

[Mr. GLASS addressed the Senate. After having spoken, with interruptions, for over two hours, he yielded the floor for the day.]

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask the Senator if he expects to conclude this afternoon? I anticipate he can not do so.

Mr. GLASS. I am very much exhausted.

Mr. CURTIS. I was about to ask unanimous consent that the Senate will take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning at the expiration of the executive session which it is desired the Senate will take. There are several Senators who want to speak on the pending bill. Therefore I submit a request that at the conclusion of the executive business the Senate, as in legislative session, take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I did want to say a few words this afternoon, but I do not desire to keep the Senate here to too late an hour. I suppose I can say what I wish to say to-morrow, when the Senator from Virginia has concluded. I wanted to reply to his speech as best I could, if I had the opportunity. I had hoped I could get a chance to say something this afternoon, but I will not insist on going on to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the executive business the Senate, as in legislative session, take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill which will be voted on to-morrow, and I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, together with letters from the Secretary of the Treasury, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and a member of the board. I ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. MCKELLAR to the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, viz: Add as a new section the following:

"SEC. —. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, be amended by adding after the words 'being eligible for discount,' and before the words 'but such definition shall not include,' the words: 'And the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount.'"

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, May 9, 1921.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I received your letter of May 7, 1921, inclosing a copy of S. 1615, a bill to amend section 13 of the Federal reserve act in respect to the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors dealing exclusively with producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state. The Treasury does not offer any objection to the bill in this form.

Very truly, yours, A. W. MELLON.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Washington, May 9, 1921.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: I have your letter of the 7th instant, inclosing copy of Senate bill No. 1615, introduced by you. I have received a letter from Chairman MCLEAN, of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, asking for the views of the board on this bill, and I am inclosing for your information copy of a letter which I have been directed to send to Senator MCLEAN regarding it, such direction being by unanimous vote of the six members of the board present at the meeting to-day.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

MAY 9, 1920.

Hon. GEORGE P. MCLEAN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have received your letter of May 6, in which you request the views of the Federal Reserve Board with regard to Senate bill 1615, the purpose of which is to amend section 13 of the Federal reserve act by inserting a provision to the effect that "the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors dealing exclusively with producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for discount."

The board desires to point out that in its judgment the phraseology of the proposed insertion would be improved if the words "making advances" were substituted for the word "dealing," in the seventh line of the bill, and the word "to" were substituted for the word "with" in the eighth line, so that the insertion would read "and the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount."

In my letter to you of December 19, 1920, expressing the board's views with regard to Senate bill 4537, which was intended to make eligible for rediscount the paper of cotton factors and commission merchants, it was pointed out that the paper was finance paper, rather than commercial or agricultural paper, since the borrower used the proceeds to make loans to his customers. The bill now under consideration—Senate bill 1615—is open to the same objection upon principle, but in view of the narrow scope of the bill under its restricted language, the Federal Reserve Board will offer no objection to it if amended as herein suggested.

Yours, very truly,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, May 10, 1921.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am writing to acknowledge your note of the 7th instant inclosing copy of your bill (S. 1615) to amend the Federal reserve act so as to make factors' paper eligible for discount by Federal reserve banks. In order to relieve the amendment of any ambiguity, I have suggested a slight change in the phrasing, which commended itself to Gov. Harding and other members of the board, to wit, the substitution of the phrase "making advances exclusively to" in place of "dealing exclusively with." In this form I believe the amendment is as unobjectionable as it could be made, consistent with the object aimed at. Believe me,

Very sincerely, yours,

A. C. MILLER.

PENSIONS TO FORMER MEMBERS OF LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am compelled to return to a committee meeting, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 37, granting pensions to certain members of the former Life-Saving Service. I think it will lead to no debate.

Mr. CURTIS. If there is to be no debate, I shall have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who served in the former Life-Saving Service of the United States as a keeper or surfman, and who, on account of disability due to a wound or injury received or disease contracted in said Life-Saving Service in line of duty, has been carried on the pay rolls for a period of one year or more under the provisions of section 7 of the act approved May 4, 1882, and who ceased to be a member of said service on account of such disability, and when said disabilities still continue, shall, upon making due proof of such facts according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, be placed on the pension roll of the United States and be entitled to receive a pension: Provided, That the rate, commencement, and duration of such pension shall be governed by the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, and for the purpose of this act the rank of surfman and keeper shall be held to be equivalent to that of a seaman and warrant officer of the United States Navy, respectively: Provided further, That no person shall receive a pension under any other law at the same time or for the same period that he is receiving a pension under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In the act creating the Coast Guard, combining the Life-Saving Service and the Revenue-Cutter Service, it was provided that the present incumbents who were disabled should be pensioned. This bill provides that those who were previously in the Life-Saving Service and were disabled, the old veterans, shall be pensioned. A similar bill passed the Senate in the Sixty-sixth Congress. It has been favorably reported by the Commerce Committee, and I think there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR ROBINSON ON THE MISSOURI & NORTH ARKANSAS RAILROAD.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech and a brief of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] on the Missouri & North Arkansas Railroad. The address was made before the Interstate Commerce Commission and the brief filed there.

There being no objection, the address and brief were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARGUMENT OF SENATOR ROBINSON BEFORE THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION URGING LOAN AND INCREASED DIVISIONS OF EARNINGS TO MISSOURI & NORTH ARKANSAS RAILROAD, JANUARY 16, 1922.

The justification for my appearance in this hearing, if any is required, is the public interests which are involved.

The suspension of operations by the Missouri & North Arkansas Railroad Co. literally has paralyzed business interests of every kind in an area of Arkansas equivalent to almost 10,000 square miles and has very detrimentally affected an equal additional area.

It is the only railway which touches or passes through the territory of Carroll, Searcy, Van Buren, Stone, and Cleburne Counties. It merely passes through the northwest corner of Van Buren County and the southwest corner of Stone County. This railroad line is the only railroad facility available for use by the citizens of a considerable portion of the following other counties: White, Faulkner, Conway, Pope, Madison, Benton, Boone, Marion, Baxter, and Independence, considerable portions of the areas of these counties being too remote from other lines which are accessible to parts of their territories.

Steady and permanent development had begun in this vast territory prior to the suspension of operations by the Missouri & North Arkansas, but that condition has been reversed by a cessation of operations, and the present situation as affects thousands of farmers, hundreds of merchants and manufacturers is pitiable beyond description. To reach any railroad many are now compelled to go over roads that are impassable except during the late spring, the summer, and early fall for a distance of from 40 to 75 miles. Such towns as Heber Springs, a health resort of national renown; Leslie and Marshall, manufacturing centers of considerable importance, especially of timber in many forms, and Harrison are now without any railroad facilities whatever. There is no practical way in which the products of this territory may reach the markets, and in consequence conditions are reverting to the standard which prevailed 30 years ago, and they will remain fixed there until railroad facilities can become available. Nothing but a resumption of operations by the Missouri & North Arkansas can afford relief.

This is not an overstatement of the facts; it is in many respects inadequate to depict the helpless condition in which industry, including agriculture, finds itself for want of transportation in what would be a prosperous section if transportation facilities were provided.

It is true that a branch line of the Missouri Pacific in a sense parallels the Missouri & North Arkansas to the north and that another line of the same system extends in the same general direction from the main line on the south of the Missouri & North Arkansas, but even a casual inspection of the map which is exhibited will show that the first is from 15 to 60 miles distant while the latter is from 60 to 100 miles distant from the Missouri & North Arkansas.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE MISSOURI & NORTH ARKANSAS.

The statement which has heretofore been made by an alleged expert to this body that the Missouri & North Arkansas was originally a logging road, begins and ends nowhere, and was never needed in view of the branch Missouri Pacific line, is, in my opinion, illustrative of the ignorance which sometimes beclouds minds which by their well-known training are presumed to act only in the sunlight of accurate information.

The Missouri & North Arkansas has for its northern terminus Joplin, Mo., a very important industrial center, and for its southern terminus Helena, Ark., on the Mississippi River, an agricultural and transportation center of no mean consequence.

It was in no sense a logging road, and the fact that the Missouri & North Arkansas was constructed before the Missouri Pacific branch line was even projected is a complete answer to the proposition that the road should not have been built because the Missouri Pacific branch line was available for the whole territory. It is not even true that the White River branch of the Missouri Pacific, which was constructed after the Missouri & North Arkansas, constitutes a duplication of service. The two lines are so remote from each other that considering the topography of the district and the lack of other transportation facilities, both the Missouri & North Arkansas and the White River branch of the Missouri Pacific are useful and necessary.

The true history of the Missouri & North Arkansas may be comprehended in a few words. The Eureka Springs Railway Co. originally constructed a line approximately 20 miles in length from Seligman, Mo.—on the main line of the Frisco—to Eureka Springs, a very popular health resort. This was then the only railroad in a territory which comprised approximately one-fifth the entire State of Arkansas, and, of course, was of comparatively slight importance considered in connection with the territory as a whole. About 1898 some capitalists acquired the Eureka Springs Railway and began the extension of the line to Leslie, a distance of about 130 miles. The road was then called the North Arkansas Railroad. Approximately two and one-half million dollars was expended and the venture seemed a failure. The project was revived and extended on the south to Helena, 158 miles farther, and from Seligman on the north to Joplin, about 75 miles additional distance, making a total length of about 350 miles. This constitutes the Missouri & North Arkansas, which represents an investment of about eight and one-half million dollars.

In 1912, I think, the road went into a receivership and nothing has been paid on the investment since.

In addition to the original capital investment represented by stocks, bonds, and notes of the company, receiver's certificates have been issued aggregating more than $2,000,000.

For a brief period from about the middle of 1916 until the end of 1917 the road was operated by Mr. Postus J. Wade as receiver, and during that period it not only paid operating expenses but interest on the receiver's certificates and a small sum in addition.

The Government assumed control January 1, 1918, and three months later raised the standard of wages to conform to that of the trunk lines generally.

After three months of Federal control the Missouri & North Arkansas was turned back to the receiver by a telegram. The receiver found the management disorganized, no money on hand, wages greatly increased, with unadjusted demands for back-pay increases. Operating expenses were then greatly in excess of operating revenues. Some weeks later the Director General of Railroads offered to lease the road from the receiver for $175,000 per annum. The owners claimed that their original investment of more than $8,500,000 and the receiver's certificates of more than $2,000,000 aggregated more than $10,500,000, not computing accumulated interest. Notwithstanding this, the lease was made.

On the 1st of March, 1920, the road was again turned back to the receiver under the six months' guaranty provision in the transportation act with the wage scale still in effect. The labor cost amounted to about two times what it was when the administration originally took over the road. Apparently regarding the situation as hopeless, Mr. Wade resigned the receivership, another was appointed, and a year thereafter, under the order of the Federal judge for the eastern district of Arkansas, the receiver undertook to cut the wage scale. A strike followed, resulting in cessation of operations. In the meantime the property of the railway company had been seriously menaced and damaged, its traffic, of course, had been reduced, and the court issued an order July 31, 1921, directing discontinuance of operations.

A foreclosure proceeding is in progress, and the road is to be sold in the early future. Under existing conditions, unless some action be taken here it will be scrapped.

This would be a calamity of such far-reaching consequence that I have assumed its prevention is so closely related to my official responsibilities, as a representative of Arkansas in the Senate, that it justifies me in appealing to the commission to apply every remedy possible under the law to assure the resumption of operations by this railroad.

THE REMEDY.

Assuming that it is clearly in the public interest that this road be operated, very great difficulty is presented in determining and applying a proper and adequate remedy.

Those who are most intimately associated with the problem, including Mr. Festus J. Wade, recognize that under existing rate divisions and wage scales the revenues of the road for the year 1922, if it be economically operated, will fall short of the operating expenses approximately $500,000. It is conceivable that within a few years, by thrift, economical management, and the development of all business legitimately tributary to the line, the expenses may be so reduced and the revenue so increased as not only to make certain that the income from operations will be sufficient to meet the expenses but that it can be made to pay a substantial income.

The possibilities of development in the territory adjacent to the road are easily established. The greater portion of the lands is fertile, but it will not be opened up to cultivation if no railroad facilities are provided. Mineral deposits, particularly zinc and coal, likely will provide constantly increasing tonnage, while products manufactured from lumber undoubtedly will increase very rapidly when transportation becomes available. The immediate difficulty, however, of overcoming the deficit in revenues so as to make the same equal or exceed operating expenses is not to be minimized and will require decisive, not to say drastic, action.

It is suggested that three steps, all of them deemed reasonable and practicable, may accomplish this end.

1. A liberal increase in the division of earnings as between the Missouri & North Arkansas and the six trunk lines operating within the transportation area, viz, Missouri, Kansas & Texas, Missouri Pacific, St. Louis & San Francisco, Cotton Belt, Santa Fe, Kansas City Southern, Yazoo & Mississippi Valley, and the Rock Island.

Paragraph 6 of section 418, transportation act, amending the first four paragraphs of section 15 of the interstate commerce act, and related provisions of the transportation act give the commission power to prescribe the just, reasonable, and equitable divisions of earnings to be received by carriers from joint rates, fares, and charges, and authorizes the commission performing that function to give consideration, among other things:

(1) To the efficiency with which the carriers concerned are operated,
(2) The amount of revenue required to pay their respective operating expenses,
(3) Taxes,
(4) A fair return on their railway property held for and used in the service of transportation,
(5) The importance to the public of the transportation services of such carriers,
(6) The commission may also consider whether any particular participating carrier is an originating, intermediate, or delivering line, and
(7) May take into consideration any other fact or circumstance which would ordinarily without regard to mileage haul entitle one carrier to greater or less portion than another carrier of the joint rate, fare, or charge.

It is believed that by a judicious and just arrangement approximately $265,000 additional revenues may be secured to the Missouri & North Arkansas by increasing present divisions 25 per cent.

This when fairly apportioned will represent no substantial diminution in the earnings of the trunk lines mentioned or any of them, and at the same time would go far toward establishing harmony between the operating revenues and expenses of the Missouri & North Arkansas. I know what was in the minds of the authors of the transportation act as to the purpose and effect of the provision giving the power to the commission to prescribe the division of joint rates, fares, and charges, for it was my privilege as a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to take an active part in framing the measure, and particularly that portion of it now referred to.

I have felt and still feel that the lines mentioned, in the exercise of a broad, reasonable, and liberal policy should facilitate any process by which an increased division of joint earnings can be assured to the Missouri & North Arkansas. If they have declined to do so, I believe that the commission should act upon the matter and do so just as quickly as may be consistent with justice, fairness, and intelligent action. There can be no doubt that this suggestion is in complete harmony with the purpose and intent of the transportation act. Of course, the limitations on the power of the commission suggest themselves. Nevertheless, I know of no facts or law, either constitutional or statute, which can be invoked to restrain the commission from the judicious exercise of the power conferred upon it by the transportation act to make a readjustment of the joint earnings of the carriers affected so as to give to the Missouri & North Arkansas the increase mentioned.

2. Efforts are also being made to secure a readjustment of wage scales so as to net a reduction in the expenses of operation, amounting to something like $300,000 per annum. It is stated that a proceeding is now pending before the Railroad Labor Board which will have this effect. The commission, I take it, can not determine this feature of the question and its mention in this connection is pertinent, principally to show that there is no impracticability in establishing harmony between revenue and expenses.

It is proposed to reduce the present wage scale 25 per cent and to apply to each labor craft the same percentage basis as was used in making the increases under Government control and since. The suggestion is that the proposed reduced wage scale run for one year, and at the end of that period any sum remaining from the earnings is to be divided among the employees of the railroad, this procedure to continue until the standard scale of wages has been reached.

No injustice appears on the face of this proposition when it is applied to every officer and employee of the railroad from receiver down, as the proposal contemplates. The pay roll of the Missouri & North Arkansas for the year 1917 is stated at $695,000 and on the standard scale for 1920 it was $1,400,000. The proposed reduction would still leave a material increase (approximately 34 per cent) over the pay roll of 1917.

Living expenses in the territory involved are, or should be, very much less than in industrial centers, and considering all the circumstances surrounding the case there appears nothing unreasonable in the suggestion that the standard wage scale should not be applied now to the Missouri & North Arkansas.

3. A loan of approximately $3,500,000, if granted by the commission, would enable the road to take up the receiver's certificates, expend a liberal sum on improving the road and its equipment, pay off its floating obligations, and leave a small but substantial balance in the treasury wherewith to do business. The receiver's certificates aggregate a little over $2,000,000. Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars would be adequate to put the roadbed and equipment in a condition to be operated, and $490,000 would pay what are termed floating obligations. This would leave approximately $200,000 in the treasury for immediate use in operations.

Under the transportation act, section 210, the commission is empowered to make loans to railroads:

(1) To enable carriers to serve the public during the transition period immediately following the termination of Federal control.

Such applications must be made within two years from the expiration of Federal control; that is, prior to March 1, 1922.

(2) The transportation act, paragraph 11, of section 15–A, of the interstate commerce act, as amended, authorizes a loan by the commission from the general railroad contingent fund to any railroad.

The commission, of course, is required to exercise discretion in the making of loans and to inquire into the present and prospective ability of the applicant to repay the same.

As security for the loan, all the authorized obligations, including eight and one-half million dollars of stock, nearly an equal amount of bonds, and the receiver's certificates are tendered so that the proposed loan of three and one-half million dollars would constitute a first lien upon the entire property, including both real estate and equipment.

It is claimed that this does not exceed the value of the road in any aspect as to its present or future condition. If the owners of the road are willing to consent to this arrangement, and I am assured that they are, the loan can be granted with safety to the Government and it will produce immeasurable benefits.

The duties of this commission are very arduous, almost overwhelming. They are of very great importance. I can not state with too great emphasis the urgent necessity for the operation of the Missouri & North Arkansas, for with this inseparably are associated the prosperity and comfort of thousands of my constituents.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if there is no one who wants to talk to-night for a short time on the pending bill, I shall move that the Senate go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that the Senator from Virginia has yielded the floor, and that he will conclude his remarks in the morning.

Mr. SMITH. I wish to make a suggestion, Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. The 5-minute rule will apply after 1 o'clock to-morrow. The Senator from Virginia desires to occupy about one hour more, which will bring us to 12 o'clock. That means that there will be only an hour for any extended remarks on the other side of this question any Senator may desire to make. I do not know that it will affect the bill—that is, the Kellogg substitute—one way or the other, but the speech of the Senator from Virginia doubtless will be answered, or, at least, some reply will be made to it. I had hoped that the Senator from Virginia might go on; but he tells me that he is tired.

Mr. CURTIS. Would there be any objection to postponing the vote to-morrow until 4 o'clock?

Mr. SMITH. I think the measure is of such importance that perhaps we had better go ahead and vote on it as the agreement now contemplates.

Mr. KENYON. Speeches can be made on it after the vote.

Mr. SMITH. Speeches on the question, for the enlightenment of the public, can be made quite as well after the vote is taken as before.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object to this program, I differ with the Senator from Virginia in nearly all he has said. He has named me in his speech. I want an opportunity to reply to his speech, and I do not want the Senate to adjourn now and let him come in in the morning and speak an hour or more, and then have Senators compelled to speak under the 5-minute rule in reply to him.

Mr. GLASS. That difficulty can be cured if we will just move forward an hour or two the time to take the vote. I am not addressing myself particularly in antagonism to the pending proposition before the Senate, but I think the Senate should be in full possession of the facts as I view them before it votes.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that we may cure the situation by changing the unanimous-consent order and taking a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. That will give three hours to-morrow for unlimited discussion.

Mr. SMITH. That will be all right.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think that will do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to changing the hour of meeting to-morrow from 11 o'clock to 10 o'clock?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to follow the Senator from Virginia in at least a 30-minute speech.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that if the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] desires to be consistent, and I think there is every reason to assume that Senators will want to talk to-morrow more than the allotted time, it can be accomplished in two ways. One is by coming together earlier in the day, and another by postponing the vote until, say, 4 o'clock. I think it will be very inconvenient for Senators to come here to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock. We all want to hear the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad the Senator wants to be here. I want him to be here.

Mr. McLEAN. Many of us have duties to perform in the morning, and it seems to me if the Senator from South Carolina really means what he says and wants more time, we can get it more conveniently by postponing for an hour or two the time of voting.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I generally mean what I say. My experience here has been that to open this kind of a proceeding after we have had an agreement, is rather difficult.

Mr. McLEAN. We would open it up for two hours only.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to have a moment in which to confer with other Senators who are interested in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to suggest that under the rule it will require a day's notice to change the unanimous-consent agreement with reference to voting on the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. If notice is given to-day, we can change the unanimous-consent agreement to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If notice is given to-day, the unanimous-consent agreement can be changed to-morrow.

Mr. McLEAN. Then I will give notice now that I shall ask to-morrow for a modification of the unanimous-consent agreement to extend the time for voting from 2 o'clock until 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut gives notice that on to-morrow he will ask unanimous consent to change the unanimous-consent agreement by changing the time of beginning the vote on the bill from 2 o'clock to 4 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If consent is given to change the unanimous-consent agreement as to the time of voting from 1 o'clock until 3 o'clock, would that require a roll call?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has given notice that he wants to reply directly to the Senator from Virginia, which is only on the general subject. Under the unanimous-consent agreement we are to vote at 1 o'clock to-morrow upon a specific measure. Some of us would like to discuss that measure. If the time is to be taken until, approximately, 1 o'clock by the Senator from Virginia and answers directly to him, we are not going to have an opportunity to discuss the measure actually before the Senate. If we could have until 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, we probably could complete all the discussion. Certainly two hours is not going to make any great difference, even with this important measure, so far as its passage is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that it would not require a roll call to-morrow to extend the time for voting from 2 o'clock until 4 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH. We are asked to meet to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock and to begin voting, as contemplated in the unanimous-consent agreement, at not later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest that if we agree to change the time of voting, that would not change the fact that the 5-minute rule would begin to operate at 1 o'clock.

Mr. McLEAN. The 5-minute rule will then begin to operate at 3 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH. It will begin at 3 o'clock.

Mr. HEFLIN. Is that stated in the request?

Mr. McLEAN. That should be understood, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair submit the request of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] that we take a recess, at the conclusion of the executive session, until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. This other matter will have to be settled to-morrow, and it need not be debated now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That request has been submitted. Is there objection to changing the hour of meeting to-morrow from 11 o'clock to 10 o'clock?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, this is the first speech I have undertaken to make in the United States Senate in the two years during which I have been a Member of it, and I do not think I ought to be harassed or obstructed in my purpose to discuss a great question which has an intimate relationship to every business interest in the country.

Senators will not come to hear the matter discussed at 10 o'clock in the morning. Very few have been here to hear it discussed so far this afternoon. I think an arrangement should be made that would give me an opportunity to present to the Senate the facts of this problem as I see them. I am not here primarily to oppose the proposed legislation. I understand there is a probability that an agreement will be arrived at which will perhaps be satisfactory to the Senate, though I do not assert it. But I do want to proceed with my speech to-morrow.

Mr. SWANSON. I think my colleague ought to be permitted to resume his speech to-morrow at 11 o'clock, when Senators can be present to hear him.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the Senator from Virginia if he consents to meeting at 11 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. GLASS. I have no objection to meeting at that hour.

Mr. CURTIS. Then under the order made a little while ago at the conclusion of the executive session the Senate as in legislative session will stand in recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has already been agreed to. A proposition was presented to modify it, but that request was withdrawn.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, if the Senator from Virginia will yield, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GLASS. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 22 minutes spent in the executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate, pursuant to its previous order, took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 17, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 16, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we thank Thee that we still live in Thy blessed remembrance. Let us resume our labors, and in doing so we invoke Thy presence and guidance that they may be borne with a renewed heart and a renewed hope. Increase in all of us a fervent desire for knowledge. O satisfy us early with its blessing, and may it be with us as a sacred sacrifice. The Lord help in all things to be true, honorable, and upright; the Lord set his seal upon us and keep us evermore. In the name of Jesus, our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 13, 1922, was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have discovered that Senate bill No. 5, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate and reported by that committee and passed by the Senate, was by an apparent oversight referred to the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It has been agreed between our committee and the Committee on the District of Columbia that a change of reference should be made to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I ask unanimous consent that that transfer be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the reference of the bill referred to be changed from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 5) to amend an act approved February 28, 1899, entitled "An act relative to the payment of claims for material and labor furnished for District of Columbia buildings."

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what committee is it referred to?

Mr. LANGLEY. It was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, as I think, erroneously.

Mr. MANN. Is it a claim against the Government?

Mr. LANGLEY. No; I do not think it is. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] suggests that my request be withheld until to-morrow. I have no objection to that.

WHAT MICHIGAN HAS DONE FOR ITS SOLDIERS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, when our country entered the World War and we were confronted with the emergency of equipping our soldiers in the shortest possible time, Michigan voted $5,000,000 to its governor to spend for needed supplies. There was built at Battle Creek, in my district, a great training camp and rendezvous, called Camp Custer. Michigan also voted $30,000,000 adjusted compensation to its World War veterans.

While the war was in progress, at the expense of nearly half a million dollars, the people of Michigan constructed a great community house, where relatives and friends of the soldiers could stay while visiting the soldiers at the camp. After the war was over the State purchased this community house for $350,000 and converted it into a hospital for the care and treatment of its soldiers and dedicated it to them. It is called the Roosevelt American Legion Hospital.

A history of this transaction, written by Mr. Paul A. Martin, commander of the Department of Michigan, appears in the American Legion Weekly of January 20, 1922, just issued, and I am sure it will be of great interest to everyone and furnish an example and precedent for the solution of the problem of caring for our sick and disabled soldiers.

Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD this article, entitled "Camp Custer Takes Care of Its Own."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the article referred to:

CAMP CUSTER TAKES CARE OF ITS OWN.

[By Paul A. Martin, commander Department of Michigan.]

(The Wolverines met the needs of their buddies afflicted with tuberculosis by equipping and running a hospital for them. Michigan is one of the first Legion departments to realize ambitious plans for meeting the problem of the disabled ex-service man.)

Four years ago a great military camp pulsed with the heartbeat of the Nation on the western outskirts of Battle Creek, Mich. Forty thousand of the best of the youth that Michigan and Wisconsin had to offer were training there. Out of it went thousands upon thousands to write their stories of heroism and of devotion to duty and to their country which go to make up the story of the World War.

Camp Custer as a molder of men of war is dead. But back to Custer are coming again those youth of 1917 and 1918 seeking there the healing touch for the wounds that war had caused. In the halls of the great Roosevelt Community House, the place which was once the social center of city and camp, they are again gathering. Yet the Roosevelt Community House, as such, is no more. Over it to-day floats not only the Stars and Stripes as in days of war but the flag of mercy, the red cross upon a field of snowy white. For the community house of the past is to-day the Roosevelt American Legion Hospital. It was dedicated November 7, 1921, by Marshal Ferdinand Foch, the gift of the State of Michigan to the American Legion of Michigan for the care of the tubercular ex-service men of that Commonwealth.

Nor is that all which the State of Michigan has done for the men who fought for it and gave their youth, their health, almost their all, for it. It turned over to the American Legion the balance in the State patriotic fund that the place might be properly equipped and maintained, and that the boys should want for nothing. This balance amounted to $684,000 in cash and nearly a million and a half in unsold bonds.

The hospital opened for its first patients on December 15.

A few days later one of the boys approached Dr. Albert M. Wehenkel, the superintendent.

"Say, Doc," he asked, "when are you going to start serving Army chow?"

The doctor smiled. "Not as long as I am here," he replied.

The face of the boy spread into a wonderful smile as he replied: "Gee, but that sounds good. You know I just sort of think I'm dreaming and that suddenly I'm going to wake up and find myself feeding on Army chow like other hospitals have."

The doctor's words reflected the spirit of the new institution, the first of its kind in the United States. For it isn't like other hospitals. There are no white walls, no "Keep quiet" signs, no "Don'ts." It is like a great home, where all the boys are members of one big family.

When you enter the main building you enter spacious halls with polished floors and soft green runners. Scattered all through this space, once the dance hall, is the rich upholstered furniture that was there when the building was a community center. Here is a great fireplace, there the billiard and pool tables. Everywhere are ferns and flowers, the gifts of the lodges and societies of the city of Battle Creek. In a little room to one side is the canteen, where soft drinks, smokes, and refreshments of all kinds can be secured. On the second floor, down corridors that branch out in all directions, are the long hallways that lead to the separate rooms where the boys live, for this hospital boasts no wards. Each occupant has his own room, furnished just as a hotel would furnish it, and each with running water for individual convenience.

Connected with the main section by porches inclosed in glass are two other buildings. These, like those in the main section, hold the rooms where the boys stay, rooms in which everything is homelike and comfortable, with windows that look out upon miles and miles of countryside, for the buildings stand on an eminence at the eastern edge of the old camp.

Nothing has been overlooked to make it a completely equipped hospital. From the great X-ray machines to the library everything is provided for the physical and mental care of those who come.

"It is to be a home where the boys will be made happy and contented," said Dr. Wehenkel. And the sentence sums up his policy.

The Department of Michigan of the American Legion has reached out to place at the head of the institution the best specialists that can be secured, bearing always in mind the fact that a successful specialist in such an institution must have the "human touch" that attracts. Only one rule is adhered to strictly, and that is that every employee in the institution, from the highest to the lowest, must be an ex-service person, for only one who has been in the service can fully comprehend the workings of the mind of the service man.

"Feed them well." Such is one maxim of Dr. Wehenkel. That is the reason the boys get three square meals every day, and in the evening find milk and lunches ready for them before they go to bed.

"Plenty of rest." Here is another idea. That is the reason that the boys can sleep late in the morning, and all of them go to bed for a couple of hours every afternoon.

"Plenty of amusement." Here is where the Legion posts of the State come in. They have organized sunshine departments. Each post or district is assigned a week or two weeks when it is responsible for entertainment at the hospital, with the idea that no post will be called on more than once during the year—with the exception, of course, of General George A. Custer Post, of Battle Creek, which is always on the job, along with its auxiliary. And the entertainment consists of everything from the best work of talented entertainers to automobile rides. Every post is kept in touch with boys in the hospital from its district. Personal visits are made from time to time.

The auxiliary is doing wonderful work in connection with the hospital, the storeroom already being filled with sweets, while a storeroom in Battle Creek is also filled, ready for the call. Comfort kits, blankets, and everything else that may be needed are provided by the auxiliary.

The institution was built by the State at a cost of $350,000. It was furnished just as a high-class summer hotel would be furnished, and these furnishings are still in it. In turning it over to the Legion the State administrative board entered into a lease with the hospital board of control, named by the department commander and consisting of the following men: Fred Z. Pantlind, Grand Rapids, chairman; John G. Emery, Grand Rapids, past national commander; Alton T. Roberts, Marquette, who had charge of the Foch tour; Fred M. Alger, Detroit; Wilbur M. Brucker, Saginaw; Dr. L. A. King, St. Joseph; Dr. Fred T. Murphy, Detroit; Mark T. McKee, Mount Clemens. This board, under the supervision of the department executive committee, has full control of the hospital.

Seventy-five lodges and other organizations of Battle Creek have reorganized the central committee that operated for entertainment and social service during the days of the camp, and now operate for the benefit of the hospital.

The hospital has its own heating plant and its own water system. It is rapidly coming to be a little city in itself and one that bids fair to be a model for other States and for the Government itself to copy after.

Its capacity at present is 300 patients. With the inclosing of the great porches and other improvements that are contemplated it will have a capacity of 500.

Two ambulances are on duty all the time, meeting every train arriving in the city and running a regular service to and from the city, which is 5 miles away.

The whole institution is Michigan's way of meeting, through the American Legion, a shortage of hospital needs that was fast becoming serious. Every case is cleared through the Legion's State welfare department, both in entering and leaving the hospital. This department, which handled 16,000 cases last year and secured over $5,000,000 in claims for ex-service men of Michigan, stands in a place by itself in the Nation. It is headed by Dr. Frank B. Broderick. For it the new Legion hospital comes as a crowning achievement in a program of service that has been notable among the States of the country.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. To-day business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent is in order. The Clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

UNALLOTTED LANDS ON FORT PECK RESERVATION, MONT.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8010) to authorize the leasing for mining purposes of unallotted lands on the Fort Peck Reservation, Mont.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be reported.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That lands reserved for school and agency purposes and all other unallotted lands on the Fort Peck Reservation, Mont., reserved from allotment or other disposition, may be leased for mining purposes by the Indians residing on said reservation, through their tribal council, with the approval of and under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

In line 6, after the word "purposes," strike out the words "by the Indians residing on said reservation, through their tribal council."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I was informed that some of this land was owned by the Government of the United States and was not tribal land owned by the Indians residing on the Fort Peck Indian Reservation. Because of that fact I wanted to have an amendment incorporated, that the general leasing law should apply to lands that are owned by the Government, and follow the rule usually followed as to leasing of land owned by the Indians by granting permission to the Secretary of the Interior to enter into such leases.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not understand the gentleman's suggestion of this matter having been before the House heretofore. But without going further into that line, it occurs to me that it would not be practicable to apply the terms of the general leasing act to lands on an Indian reservation under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department and used for Indian purposes. Such land on other reservations where they are recognized as the property of the Indians are leased in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, through the Indian Office, and controlled by the Indian Office. The rules governing the general leasing act could not, I think, all of them, be properly applied to lands of this character.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not intend to have a different rule applied to lands which are owned by the Indians to the lands on this reservation, but I was informed that some of the lands that will be covered by this bill are lands that are owned by the Government and to which the Indians have no rights whatsoever.

Mr. MANN. All the agency and school lands referred to are owned by the Government, as stated by the report.

Mr. MONDELL. They are owned by the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed over temporarily and taken up later. The gentleman who reported the bill is temporarily out of the Chamber.

Mr. STAFFORD. That has not been our practice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] asks unanimous consent that the bill go over temporarily. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN PUBLIC-LAND ENTRIES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1099) to amend section 2372 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] if this measure was introduced to cover some particular cases that may be pending?

Mr. SINNOTT. They have some 40 or 50 cases in the Land Department that this act will enable them to clear up.

Mr. WALSH. I do not quite understand what the gentleman means by the expression "clear up."

Mr. SINNOTT. There are some 40 or 50 final entries that the department erroneously canceled, according to a decision of the Supreme Court. Other parties now have title to those lands, and the passage of this act will enable the Secretary of the Interior to make an adjustment and to permit the original entrymen, who are entitled to the land, to secure other lands in lieu of those on which they filed and made final proof, and will enable the present owners and occupants, some of whom have received patents to the lands, to retain those lands.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, this will apply to the future also.

Mr. SINNOTT. As far as the future is concerned, of course, the same mistake will not occur again that occurred in the past, because the Supreme Court has decided the matter in the case of Lane v. Hogan (224 U. S.), and that decision of the Supreme Court really necessitates the passage of this legislation.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Let me see if I understand the case. Is this a case where a man had made an entry on land and the department refused his application for a particular reason, and the court thereafter decided that the man was entitled to make the entry? Meanwhile, the entry having been refused, somebody else had entered the land and obtained it, and this is designed to permit the original entryman to enter on his land?

Mr. SINNOTT. Only after final entry. The original entrymen must have made final entry, must have proved up on their land, and after having proved up on the land the department in these instances canceled the entry.

Mr. MANN. On the ground that the original entryman was not entitled to make the entry?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; because protests had been filed by special agents against the good faith of the original entryman, and they permitted a period of two years to elapse before taking action upon the protests. Then they canceled the entries, and the Supreme Court held that that was an erroneous cancellation, and that the original entrymen were entitled to the land. In the meantime the entries had been canceled and other parties, second entrymen, had entered the same land, and in a number of these cases the second entryman has received a patent for the land. Now, unless we pass this legislation the original entryman may oust the second entryman or patentee. This permits the Secretary of the Interior to allow the original entryman to take lieu land.

Mr. WALSH. Who permitted the two years to elapse?

Mr. SINNOTT. The department permitted the two years to elapse without taking action upon the protests.

Mr. WALSH. Can they do that under the law?

Mr. SINNOTT. Here is the law:

Provided, That after the lapse of two years from the date of the issuance of the receiver's receipt upon the final entry of any tract of land under the homestead, timber-culture, desert-land, or preemption laws, or under this act, and when there shall be no pending contest or protest against the validity of such entry, the entryman shall be entitled to a patent conveying the land by him entered, and the same shall be issued to him; but this proviso shall not be construed to require the delay of two years from the date of said entry before the issuing of a patent therefor.

The Interior Department held that these representations, or so-called protests made by special agents, prevented the statute from running. The Supreme Court held that those protests were not legal protests in the meaning of the law which prevented the statute from running, and that it was the duty of the department to have served notice upon the original entrymen notice of the protests filed, and that the department not having served notices, there was no protest pending, and that the original entrymen were entitled to their land.

Mr. WALSH. This provision is tacked onto that section.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is not tacked onto this section. It is tacked onto another section.

Mr. WALSH. It is tacked onto another section and is almost contradictory of the first part of the section, is it not?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; it is not contradictory at all. The first part of the section to which this is attached relates to a somewhat similar matter, but an entirely different one.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me it is drawing the distinction down pretty fine.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does this legislation affect in any way the rights of scrip holders?

Mr. SINNOTT. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It has nothing to do with filings made in the name of scrip?

Mr. SINNOTT. No.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Were these special agents to whom the gentleman refers agents of the Interior Department?

Mr. SINNOTT. They were Government agents, yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Are these the cases in which such special agents made protests or are other parties involved?

Mr. SINNOTT. These are the cases where special agents made protests, and perhaps other parties may have made protests, but they were not legal protests within the view of the law.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In the case where the special agents made protests it would appear that the Interior Department itself was trying to prevent the entryman from getting the land. Is that the fact?

Mr. SINNOTT. The Department of the Interior canceled the entries upon the showing made in these protests, which the Supreme Court held to be erroneous.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is not the effect of the attitude and conduct of the department that the department itself was endeavoring to prevent the entrymen from getting the land?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; and they misconstrued the law as giving them authority when they did not have the authority to do what they did.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I always supposed that the Land Office was in favor of entrymen taking land instead of throwing obstacles in their way.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Oregon will yield, the gentleman from Illinois is not very well acquainted with the situation, if he does not know that the people who have been taking land in the past have had the idea that the department was at times disposed to defeat them instead of protecting them.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is the point I am making. I do not see why they should not favor those who want to get the land.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if there are still lands they can file on for those which they have been deprived of in the past?

Mr. SINNOTT. The lands are not all taken. Of course, the gentleman understands that the best lands have all been taken up, and these men will only get the culls.

Mr. MONDELL. May I call attention to the fact that no case of an entry with regard to which fraud was charged can be affected by this legislation. The Supreme Court, while it has held that the act referred to does protect an entry, has also held that where the question of fraud is raised the act referred to does not secure the entryman in his title, or at least does not protect him from prosecution. It is a very common thing to have the title attacked on the ground of fraud long after the patent—10 years or 30 years after the patent is issued. Many cases are pending where the patent was issued years ago, and has been attacked on the ground of fraud. So the cases that we seek to relieve are cases where the statute protected the entry, there being no fraud alleged in connection with the entry.

Mr. SINNOTT. We struck out certain language of the original Senate bill so as to leave the question open, and so that anyone guilty of fraud might be proceeded against.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What is going to be the effect of the rules prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior changing the entry and transferring the payment to another tract of surveyed public lands nonmineral in character? Do you just change that entry? If so, the entryman will find himself in the same position with reference to the other tract as to the regulations and requirements and payments.

Mr. SINNOTT. Probably he will have credit for the payments made on the first entry.

Mr. WALSH. How about the other conditions?

Mr. SINNOTT. If he conformed with the law in regard to the original entry, he will probably have credit for all the time, if he earned the original entry.

Mr. WALSH. Will he not have to conform to the requirements as to the filing and residence?

Mr. SINNOTT. He will have to conform to the requirements as to filing, but as to residence he will not, because he has already lived three or five years on the original entry.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Assuming that he entered originally on a 40-acre tract, would his occupation of that 40-acre tract be extended to a 640-acre tract under the arid-land law?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, no. The Secretary would draft rules and regulations in regard to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I see nothing in the act to limit the amount of acreage that the entryman could obtain.

Mr. SINNOTT. He would be limited by the homestead laws.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of an objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2372 of the Revised Statutes is amended by adding thereto the following:

"In all cases where a final entry of public lands has been or may be hereafter canceled, and such entry is held by the Land Department or by a court of competent jurisdiction to have been confirmed under the proviso to section 7 of the act of March 3, 1891 (Twenty-sixth Statutes, p. 1099), if the land has been disposed of to or appropriated by a claimant under the homestead or desert-land laws, or patented to a claimant under other public-land laws, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, and under rules to be prescribed by him, to change the entry and transfer the payment to any other tract of surveyed public land, nonmineral in character, free from lawful claim, and otherwise subject to general disposition: Provided, That the entryman, his heirs, or assigns shall file a relinquishment of all right, title, and interest in and to the land originally entered: Provided further, That no right or claim under the provisions of this paragraph shall be assignable or transferable."

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "such entry shall unless" and insert the word "if."

Page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "be reinstated and passed to patent; and in case the land has been so disposed of or appropriated."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

PLUMAS NATIONAL FOREST.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5003) to provide for the consolidation of forest lands in the Plumas National Forest, Calif., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] if he is in favor of this measure?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Were there hearings held upon it?

Mr. RAKER. There were hearings held on the general proposition relative to the exchange. There was a special bill and other bills, and the parties who are familiar with the local conditions presented the matter as to the local conditions. Being personally familiar with this territory for 35 years, I presented the facts outside of the local question to the committee and letters and opinions that I had.

Mr. WALSH. The hearings that were held upon the general subject and which covered these various desired exchanges by general law was held during the last Congress.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I have read those hearings, and I gathered from them that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] was one of the few members of the committee who was very much opposed to making the exchanges.

Mr. RAKER. If the House will permit, in a very few words I could give my position upon that, and it has been confirmed since returning from California after investigation of the same subject. Each bill ought to be separate, just as a bridge bill, so that the community involved might have an opportunity to be heard upon the bill, to say whether or not they are in favor of the legislation, because it affects the local community as well as the public in so far as the question of taxation is concerned. Some communities are favorable to it and other communities oppose this character of legislation.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, this is not analogous to the bridge bills. Congress passed a general law covering the construction of bridges across navigable waters and providing what requirements must be made with reference to the filing of plans, and a number of other matters. This is providing a different method for a number of different forests. It seems to me if we are going to come in with individual bills to change the requirements in different instances, that we would better pause here now and let the committee give some further consideration to passing the general law on the subject.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman has read the hearings and has noted the objections made by myself and others. If the gentleman will investigate, he will find that both departments adopted the suggestions I made before the committee relative to the question of exchange, and that all of the bills the Department of the Interior has reported on uniformly carried the suggestions made. I believe we have come to a conclusion whereby the public will be protected as well as the individuals.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from California explain why the bill providing for exchange of forest lands is different from some of the other bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, there is quite a difference.

Mr. STAFFORD. It differs in this, that the Secretary of Agriculture in his report upon this bill reports adversely as to certain provisions of the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says no; but if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, I shall direct the attention of the House in support of my position to the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture which appears on page 5 of the report. Attention is drawn to the fact that the bill as drawn would not permit the acceptance of lands except they were absolutely free from any encumbrance. He goes on to point out that this would prevent the exchange of title to lands which were traversed by railroads, irrigation ditches, telephone lines, and county roads. The bill as reported forbids the exchange of any lands except they are free and clear from encumbrances. There is a bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar relating to the Snoqualmie National Forest, where that condition is not contained at all, where the committee has followed the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture. Does the gentleman deny that the bill in which he is directly interested does not forbid the exchange of these lands unless they are free and clear of encumbrances?

Mr. RAKER. If I may answer the gentleman, this bill contains practically all of the conditions presented by the Secretary of the Interior, and as to the Secretary of Agriculture the bill provides that the Government may reserve those rights on the land that is transferred but not to private individuals.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is not answering my question.

Mr. RAKER. I shall answer it. It does not permit an exchange where the private individual has put a lien or an encumbrance upon his land. That is as it ought to be.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet the Secretary of Agriculture recommends the elimination of that for certain good reasons.

Mr. RAKER. That is not what he means. He refers to minerals.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; the gentleman did not hear my reading of the letter. This does not refer to minerals. It refers to rights of way by railroads or roads; and with the indulgence of the House and for the special benefit of the gentleman I shall read it again.

Mr. RAKER. I understood it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I will not read it again.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, the Agricultural Committee held four days' hearings last week upon a forestry bill that has some general comprehensive legislation applying to the whole country that deals with matters of this kind. It seems to me it would be better to take these matters up in a measure that relates to the whole situation and not take them up piecemeal.

Mr. RAKER. That bill does not cover the purpose of these exchanges. There are many who favor the gentleman's bill, but the question is not involved in that bill, and in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin further——

Mr. SNELL. But that provides for a general exchange of lands according to the recommendation of the Department of the Interior or the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. RAKER. That has not been incorporated in the bill as yet.

Mr. SNELL. It is in the present bill before the Committee on Agriculture at the present time.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, who has the floor?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I take it that this is another one of these bills by which we propose to add to forest reserves private lands, providing for the exchange of timber. As Members know, I have been fighting this kind of thing in my district ever since I have been here. I know there is waste of public money in my district, and I have about come to the conclusion that there is a great deal of waste in other districts. Heretofore I have been content to let other Congressmen look after their own districts, but notwithstanding that the majority of Congress has seen fit to resist any efforts I made to get rid of this sort of foolishness in my district. That policy having failed, I am going to attempt another policy, and therefore I object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may go to the foot of the calendar, and perhaps in the meantime the gentleman may be able to see the light.

Mr. WINGO. It is not a question of my seeing the light. I want the gentleman and others to see the light.

Mr. RAKER. Let it go to the foot of the calendar until next time.

Mr. WINGO. The end of the calendar is a very appropriate place for it, but I will object to that.

EX-SERVICE HOMESTEAD SETTLERS AND DESERT-LAND ENTRYMEN.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8815) to authorize certain homestead settlers or entrymen on United States reclamation projects who entered the military or naval service of the United States during the war with Germany to make final proof of their entries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the bill is not significant for special mention, certainly the report is, as it is prepared by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], and is very illuminating. I do not recall another instance, not even in reports submitted by that distinguished gentleman, and those reports are always generally extended, where the act has been repeated three times. We have now before us for the first time a report where the amendment that is suggested by the committee has been printed three times. I would think that once would be sufficient. Of course, to the ordinary Member, one time would be enough. For the benefit of some gentlemen, maybe—perhaps for the benefit of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]—he prints it three times. We first find it on page 1 of the report. It says:

Strike out all of the bill after line 2, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And then comes the first mention of the amendment, 18 lines. In the next place is this very illuminating language:

The bill as thus amended by the committee reads as follows:

And then it repeats with this slight change, that has the enacting clause, the same identical language. Then, again, we find it incorporated in the letter addressed to the chairman of the committee. Now, the sponsor for this is the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]. I think it worth while to make passing comment of this, because in my brief service in the House, in examining these bills, I do not know of any occasion, even with bills reported by the gentleman from California, where he has illuminated the report by printing the same identical matter three times at the expense of the taxpayers.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman read the entire report?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have.

Mr. MANN. Read the bill three times in the report?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read it twice. I did not read it the third time.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman understand it?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am going now to make some inquiries about the bill proper. Of course, the repetition of the bill reported did not add to my enlightenment each time that I read it. I first read the bill and amendment as carried in the bill; then I read the report, and then I read the amendment, as recommended, twice. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to direct an inquiry to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], or the gentleman reporting the bill as to whether, if the bill is adopted, these war veterans would have a right for an unlimited time to indefinitely make proof as provided in this bill? Here is a soldier, a war veteran, who has made an entry on irrigated land. He does not wish to take advantage of the privileges granted. Under the terms of this bill, as I read it, he would be granted permission for life before he would be obliged to perfect his entry under the liberal policy as suggested by this bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. He would have to conform to the law in regard to making final proof. There is a specific period mentioned in the statutes, but if he were maimed or wounded or physically disabled, he could not make his final proof and secure the land.

Mr. STAFFORD. What limit of time would he have, under the proposed amendment, to make the final proof?

Mr. SINNOTT. The law does not change the statutory period that we have now.

Mr. STAFFORD. When would he first have to exercise this privilege which is granted to him under this amendment?

Mr. SINNOTT. He could exercise that at any time, as soon as he makes the showing. If he was disabled or wounded or incapacitated——

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the point, the indefiniteness of it. Do you wish a war veteran who has been incapacitated to have that right for life, or should he exercise it within a certain limit of time? I am in sympathy with the general purposes of the law, but I do not think it proper in connection with the irrigation law to have the entries held up to await the pleasure of some disabled soldier during his lifetime.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is incumbent upon him to make a showing or the land would be subject to cancellation.

Mr. STAFFORD. He has to make a showing; but this law would give him the absolute right during his lifetime to make that showing.

Mr. SINNOTT. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the limitation?

Mr. SINNOTT. In the original act. He would have to make the showing within a certain time, and under the old law it is seven years and under the homestead law five years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here is the question that I want answered. How soon must he exercise his right of making proof?

Mr. RAKER. As it is at the present time the only changes are that under the act of March 1, 1921, the House passed a bill relieving the soldier similarly situated for his homestead. On December 15, 1921, we passed an act relieving a soldier similarly situated as to his desert claims.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am well aware of that fact.

Mr. RAKER. This relieves a soldier who has a homestead under the reclamation project and puts him in the same position as the two acts we have already passed, and he has to make his final proof and take the same action as he would in other cases, under the same limitation of time, without any distinction whatever, and as soon as the land is thrown open he then proceeds to comply with the law, and instead of being required to perform the irrigation, if he is disabled he may go ahead.

Now, I just want to read this letter for the information of the House, if I may be permitted:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS OF THE UNITED STATES, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1922.

The Hon. JOHN E. RAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Through the press of business we have been unable to communicate with you until this time in which to give a full indorsement of this organization to H. R. 8815 and special report No. 500, and appreciate the interest that you, yourself, have taken in soldier land legislation.

Yours, very truly,

EDWIN S. BETTELHEIM, Jr.,
Chairman.

They have gone into this question and heartily recommend this legislation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I recall the reservation of the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any settler or entryman under the homestead laws of the United States upon a United States reclamation project who, after settlement, application, or entry, and prior to November 11, 1918, enlisted or was actually engaged in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the war with Germany, who has been honorably discharged and because of physical incapacities due to service is unable to return to the land, may make proof without further residence, improvement, cultivation, or irrigation at such time and place as may be authorized by the Secretary of the Interior and receive patent to the land by him so entered or settled upon: Provided, That no such patent shall issue prior to the survey of the land and the payment of all fees, commissions, and water charges due the United States on account of such land at the time of the issuance of patent.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the act approved March 1, 1921 (41 Stat., p. 1202), be amended to read as follows: 'That any bona fide settler, applicant, or entryman under the homestead laws of the United States, or any desert land entryman whose entry is subject to the provisions of the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat., p. 388), who, after settlement, application, or entry, and prior to November 11, 1918, enlisted or was actually engaged in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the war with Germany, who has been honorably discharged and because of physical incapacities due to the service is unable to return to the land, may make final proof, without further residence, improvement, cultivation, or reclamation, at such time and place as may be authorized by the Secretary of the Interior, and receive patent to the land by him so entered or settled upon, subject to the provisions of the act or acts under which such settlement or entry was made: Provided, That no such patent shall issue prior to the conformation of the entry to a single farm unit, as required by the act of August 13, 1914 (38 Stat., p. 686): And provided further, That this act shall not be construed to exempt or relieve such applicant or entryman from payment of any lawful fees, commissions, purchase moneys, water charges, or other sums due to the United States, or its successors in control of the reclamation project, in connection with such lands.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended to conform to the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, may I have unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know what the gentleman is going to talk about.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to say a word about the criticism that has been made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not object.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JURISDICTION OF THE STATE OF TEXAS OVER CERTAIN LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2133) ceding jurisdiction to the State of Texas over certain lands or bancos acquired by the United States of America from the United States of Mexico.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the lands or bancos acquired by the Government of the United States of America by virtue of its treaty with the United States of Mexico of March 20, 1905, and subsequent thereto, and which lie adjacent to the territory of the State of Texas as constituted by the compromise act of Congress of September 9, 1850, and accepted by the State of Texas on November 25, 1850, shall be and become a part of the State of Texas, and shall be under the civil and criminal jurisdiction of said State of Texas, and of the respective subdivisions of said State of Texas, wherein said land lies; and that all lands or bancos hereafter acquired by the United States of America from the United States of Mexico, by virtue of said treaty, which shall lie adjoining to the State of Texas, shall be and become part of said State of Texas and be subject to its civil and criminal jurisdiction without any further enactment from the Congress of the United States.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act ceding jurisdiction to the State of Texas over certain lands or bancos heretofore or hereafter acquired by the United States of America from the United States of Mexico."

With committee amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after the word "Texas," strike out "and of the respective subdivisions of said State of Texas, wherein said lands lie."

On page 2, line 7, strike out the word "from" and insert in lieu thereof the word "by."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Texas explain what a "banco" is?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I shall try to do so. Under the boundary treaty of 1905 between the United States and Mexico certain accumulations of soil or islands cut off from the one country or the other by the shifting of the channel of the Rio Grande River were called bancos; they are denominated bancos in that treaty. That answers the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. The lands are portions of the banks that have been separated by the action of the river?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. HUDSPETH. They are simply islands in the stream.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Islands and portions of Mexican lands cut off by the shifting of the stream of the river and transferred to the Texas side.

Mr. WALSH. Is there no provision in the treaty to which the gentleman has referred as to the jurisdiction of these bancos?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that this is the situation exactly: By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, entered into in 1848, and also by the act of Congress of 1850, the boundary line of the United States was fixed at the center of the Rio Grande River as it existed at that time. By the compromise act of 1850 accepted by Texas the Texas boundary was the same. In 1905 the United States entered into a treaty with Mexico providing for a boundary commission. That commission was authorized in the case of bancos created by the shifting of the stream to establish the boundary line to conform to the changes in the stream, and if the river cuts off a banco from Mexico and places it on the American side it becomes American territory; and, vice versa, if the river cuts off a banco from the American side and places it on the Mexican side it becomes Mexican territory. But under that treaty, while bancos become United States territory, they do not become a part of the territory of the State of Texas, so that we have the anomalous condition of some bancos being United States territory but belonging to no State. The purpose of this bill is simply to convey to Texas civil and criminal jurisdiction over such bancos; in other words, to make them part of the State of Texas.

Mr. WALSH. Are these bancos sufficient in area to be inhabited; to have people on them?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Some of them are. Some of them are a hundred acres or so in extent.

Mr. WALSH. Then, under the existing conditions they become part of the public lands of the United States, do they?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No. I will say to the gentleman that the treaty provides that the title of the lands shall remain in the original owner. They do not become a part of the property of the United States. They simply come under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. To whom do they pay taxes now?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. They do not pay taxes to anybody now, as I understand, because there are no law courts that operate on these bancos at all. They are a no man's land.

Mr. WALSH. That is quite a convenient haven.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. It is.

Mr. WALSH. I am surprised that it has not been discovered before. Does the Volstead Act operate there? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that these bancos offer harbors for bandits and other criminals who operate from one side of the river to the other.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Regardless of the Volstead Act.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The courts of the State of Texas have no jurisdiction, because these bancos are not a part of the State of Texas. The Federal courts have no jurisdiction, because they are not within any Federal district as defined in the statute as comprising certain counties. They are not in any county.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, this is to operate in the future; but will it not be necessary for the State of Texas in the future to accept these bancos as they shall be formed?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. This act provides not only for the past but for the future; but the State of Texas would doubtless have to accept them by an act of the legislature. I hold in my hand a resolution of the Legislature of Texas passed July 15, 1919, requesting Congress to take this action, and accepting such bancos as a part of Texas whenever an act like this shall be enacted.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, Texas is a State the area of which we must be careful not to permit to be decreased. It is liable to become a mere dot on the map if it does not have a few of these bancos added to it from time to time.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that through the operation of the treaty of 1905 the United States has taken away a part of the territory of Texas, which has been given to Mexico. Therefore we think it but fair that Mexico reimburse us by giving in turn to the State of Texas these tracts that we get from Mexico.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. The operation of the Rio Grande River there is very interesting. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the boundary between the United States and Mexico is defined, not by the channel of the river but by some definite line established by latitude and longitude?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, no; the boundary line is the Rio Grande River, but that is not a fixed boundary, because the channel of the river shifts and changes from time to time. The treaty of 1905 with Mexico provides that the boundary commission, which consists of a representative of the United States Government and a representative of the Mexican Government, shall from time to time as the river changes its bed make actual surveys of the ground and make maps, running red lines to show where the boundary is and where the center of the channel really is, and file those maps, and that thereby that particular line becomes the true boundary line between the countries. The duty of the commission is to physically locate the true channel of the river.

Mr. HICKS. I should imagine that this contingency might arise pending the action of the commission, that the river having made a big bend somewhere, a certain parcel of land that was formerly in Mexico might become a part of the territory of the United States, and therefore there might be some question as to getting access to the river at that particular point, because a part of the territory of Mexico having been turned over to the United States, would there not be some question as to the title?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does the gentleman mean that there might be a question as to the ownership of the land?

Mr. HICKS. The ownership of the land.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The treaty provides for that. The boundary treaty is in Senate document 357, volume 1, page 1201. Section 3 provides that whenever a banco is cut off from Mexico anyone who resides on that banco or owns property on the banco shall be protected in his title and his rights. If his home is cut off into Texas he has the right to retain his Mexican citizenship if he desires, or he may become an American citizen by reason of having been cut off from Mexico into Texas territory.

Mr. HICKS. That is the point I was getting at, because I could see that there might be some time when a man would not know under which sovereignty he was living.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The treaty undertakes to cover all those cases and provides for the protection of all private property affected, so that these bancos do not become a part of the public land, but simply come under the governmental jurisdiction of the United States; and if they are to be under the jurisdiction of the United States, then they ought to be within the jurisdiction of some State.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. What is meant by the words "and accepted by the State of Texas on November 25, 1850," in lines 8 and 9, on page 1 of the bill?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That refers to an act of Congress that was passed in 1850.

Mr. MANN. That refers to the compromise act?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes; as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. It is proposed to amend the title of this bill so that it will read:

An act ceding jurisdiction to the State of Texas over certain lands or bancos heretofore or hereafter acquired by the United States of America from the United States of Mexico.

What the bill does is to add territory to the State of Texas without her consent. Does the gentleman think we have the power to do that?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not think the gentleman can go quite that far.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think we can add territory to a State without the consent of that State?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not.

Mr. MANN. This bill does.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman must have overlooked the fact that I referred to a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Texas, requesting that Congress do this very thing, and of course the legislature could accept it hereafter.

Mr. MANN. I know; but that does not go to the point I am making. Here is an act of Congress—and I suppose it is probably the first one of its kind in the history of the Government—which says that certain lands not now in the State of Texas shall be and become a part of the State of Texas. What I want to do is to ask the gentleman whether it would not be wise to say that this shall happen upon the acceptance of this act by the State of Texas?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. So we shall not undertake to say that we have the power to add territory to a State without the acceptance of the State.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. While I do not object to the gentleman's proposed amendment and would be glad to have him offer it, I will say to him that the legal effect of this act, even under the gentleman's construction of it, would simply be that the Government of the United States by this act, in so far as it can, confers this territory on the State of Texas; and even if that were not legal, it certainly would be cured by an act of the legislature accepting what the Government of the United States has undertaken to do.

Mr. MANN. Is it not better to have it legal when we pass it?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I grant you that. I was only answering the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be wise also, where we are ceding civil and criminal jurisdiction, to amend the title by saying "adding lands to the State of Texas and ceding jurisdiction"?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I have no objection to that. It seems to me that if we put these lands into the State of Texas it necessarily implies jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. Your bill does it twice. I think it would be sufficient to insert it in the bill, but the bill goes on and says "and shall be under the civil and criminal jurisdiction of said State of Texas," which probably is saying the same thing twice in different language. The important thing is adding lands to the State of Texas, and that ought to be stated in the title. I shall offer such an amendment if the gentleman has no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to insert on page 1, line 9, after the word "shall" the words "upon the acceptance of this act by the State of Texas."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MANN: Page 1, line 9, after the word "shall" insert the words "upon the acceptance of this act by the State of Texas."

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman not think that the act should be accepted by the Legislature of the State of Texas?

Mr. MANN. That is the only way in which it can be accepted.

Mr. WALSH. They might in accepting it provide for a referendum.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to a referendum.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The only way that the State of Texas could act would be through its legislature, and we have no referendum except on the constitution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the committtee amendment as to the title by inserting after the word "act" the words "adding lands to the State of Texas and."

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

Amendment to the title by Mr. MANN: After the word "act" insert the words "adding lands to the State of Texas and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment to the title was agreed to.

The bill as amended was passed.

PROTECTION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED TIMBER FROM FIRE, DISEASE, AND INFESTATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9495) providing for the protection of timber owned by the United States from fire, disease, or ravages of beetles or other insects.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I appreciate the importance of the Secretary of the Interior having the authority intended to be conveyed in the bill, but I would like to get some information from the chairman of the committee just why this Congress at this time should pass this bill in this shape.

Mr. SINNOTT. There is no authority at law at the present time authorizing the Appropriations Committee to make an appropriation for such purpose. The public lands containing timber outside of the national forests are within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior. There is authority at law for the Appropriations Committee to make a similar appropriation to that provided for herein for the protection of the national forests. In a great many places timber on the public lands—and I mean by public lands Government lands distinct from the national forests—in many cases the public lands contain timber that abut the forest reserves, and in other cases they intermingle. In the last deficiency bill we secured an appropriation for the purposes mentioned in this bill that would have been subject to a point of order if anyone had made it. It is necessary in fighting fire and eradicating the pests from the national forest to have the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture work in conjunction with the State and private owners.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman understand that there is ample law on the statute books to do the same thing that is provided for here by the Secretary of Agriculture on lands under his jurisdiction?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. But outside of that the appropriation would be subject to a point of order?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; the appropriation in the deficiency bill would have been subject to a point of order if anybody had made it.

Mr. SNELL. I think it is very important.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. This provides for an appropriation against fire. Is it contemplated that the fire apparatus and fire control when purchased may be operated for the benefit of private owners?

Mr. SINNOTT. That would rest with the Appropriations Committee when the money is appropriated. It is necessary for all the parties to work together to protect the timber.

Mr. HICKS. That is the point I was coming at. I am wondering what would be the effect. Here is a fire in a Government reserve, and right next to it is a State reservation. Does not the Government go on the border line and help the State protect its property?

Mr. SINNOTT. They mutually help each other. We have provisions under the laws of the State of Oregon, the State of California, and, I think, the State of Idaho for such cooperative work.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is also true that there is a Federal appropriation annually made for the protection of the timber. Last year's expenditures were made to put out the forest fires.

Mr. HICKS. This bill would provide that the Federal Government could send their apparatus right into private property and help them protect their forests without violating any Government law.

Mr. SINNOTT. The way the committee did it before was this: They made the appropriation before upon the condition that the States and the private owners would join in. They made it in the form of a limitation. They are spending that money now, but the appropriation was subject to the point of order, and the committee would have been helpless if the point had been made.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Would it not be duplication of work to authorize the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture also to do this kind of work?

Mr. SINNOTT. They both have jurisdiction over separate bodies of timber. Here is the national forest. The Secretary of Agriculture has jurisdiction over that, and the timber on the public lands is under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES of Texas. So that they would maintain separate forces on the same piece of land?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, they would probably come together and get the same force, but it would enable them to work in harmony and cooperate.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the Secretary of Agriculture undertake to protect all of the timber on the public lands in the national forests?

Mr. SINNOTT. Just in the national forests; and there is authority of law permitting him to protect them, which authorizes the Committee on Appropriations to make this appropriation, but without this legislation the Appropriations Committee could not make the necessary appropriation for the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This bill also provides for the national parks.

Mr. SINNOTT. The national parks are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES of Texas. All of them?

Mr. SINNOTT. All of them.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand the language of this act corresponds to the authority now resting with the Secretary of Agriculture relative to forest lands?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. And it does not go beyond the authority of the Agricultural Department?

Mr. SINNOTT. No.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It seems to me the language is broad enough to perhaps cause some trouble. The bill provides as follows:

timber owned by the United States upon the public lands, national parks, national monuments, Indian reservations, or other lands owned by the United States.

The language "other lands owned by the United States" may include military reservations.

Mr. JONES of Texas. And they may be national forests.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is it intended to permit the Secretary of the Interior to go into military reservations, of which we have a large number, very large in scope, and exercise authority there where the Secretary of War has jurisdiction?

Mr. SINNOTT. The Appropriation Committee of course would not make any appropriation for that purpose, and there are probably no forests of any extent upon such military reservations.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why use the phrase "or other lands" at all?

Mr. SINNOTT. There may be some other odds and ends of lands under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MONDELL. Have that language inserted—"under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why not amend it to read "other lands under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior"?

Mr. SINNOTT. That would be satisfactory.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I shall offer that amendment at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to protect and preserve, from fire, disease, or the ravages of beetles, or other insects, timber owned by the United States upon the public lands, national parks, national monuments, Indian reservations, or other lands owned by the United States, either directly or in cooperation with other departments of the Federal Government, with States, or with owners of timber; and appropriations are hereby authorized to be made for such purposes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Page 1, line 7, after the word "lands," insert the words "under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the amendment makes very much difference, because I think it will be found that any other land the United States owns, not under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, would be found to be under the jurisdiction of some other department.

I want to say a word or two in regard to the bill. In addition to the work being done by the Agricultural Department, it is the fact that on the public land owned by the Government at the present time, scattered about among privately owned lands, the white-pine beetle and the beetle have destroyed in the State of California and in Oregon during the last five years more timber than has been destroyed by fire. Our people have been contributing to the Forest Service and the Government generally to protect their own lands, and to assist the Government in protecting its lands. It is high time that the Government was protecting its holdings on the public domain, and appropriating enough to protect its timber on the reserves that are within the counties upon which no taxation is paid. We are, of course, receiving a small amount allowed to us by virtue of revenue obtained by the department, but I think the Government owes something to these States where the timber is, particularly to stop the ravages of the various timber insects that are destroying millions of feet of timber in these timbered States. This bill would authorize it so that we can go before the Committee on Appropriations and obtain from the Government proper aid and assistance. I am strong for this bill which comes from our Committee on the Public Lands of the House.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the term "public lands," here used in line 6, include national forests?

Mr. RAKER. In my view it does not.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Why does it not?

Mr. RAKER. This includes all the lands that are not within the national forests. They have authority now to appropriate for the national forests.

The only thing is they do not appropriate enough money to do the work, and that is all.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand that proposition, and I understand the gentleman's construction, but I do not see the reason for such construction.

Mr. RAKER. It is the law.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In the term "public lands" the Agricultural Department has authority to do certain work in national forests, and this gives authority to the Secretary of the Interior to duplicate the work.

Mr. RAKER. Public lands that are open to entry, all other lands that there are any strings on, or in withdrawal, are not public lands.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman mean to say that lands owned by the United States Government in the national forests are not public lands?

Mr. RAKER. They do not class them as public lands.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not care how you class them. Does the gentleman mean to say they are not public lands?

Mr. RAKER. They are not what we call, in the parlance of legislation, public lands, because they are public lands with a reservation.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman says "not what we." Whom does the gentleman refer to when he says "we"?

Mr. RAKER. I mean the United States. We are a part of it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Has it been judicially determined that the term "public lands" excludes national forests?

Mr. RAKER. Absolutely. It has been determined by the Department of the Interior and by the Supreme Court in a late case in Imperial Valley, Calif., that "public land" meant land that there were no strings upon, and when there is any reservation or withdrawal or claim against the land by the Government or the individual it is not public land.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Was that in a suit in which lands in the national forests were involved?

Mr. RAKER. In the Reclamation Service; and there was reclamation withdrawal, and therefore it was not public land.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 1, line 6, after the word "lands," insert "other than national forests."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 1, line 6, after the word "lands," insert the words "other than national forests."

Mr. MONDELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that that is entirely unnecessary and very confusing. The act is limited to lands under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I am afraid that amendment only refers to other lands, in line 7. It says "other lands under the supervision of the Department of the Interior." I do not think that that expression refers——

Mr. MONDELL. The term "public land" never includes lands reserved in any way, for forest reserves or any other public land. And so to say "public lands other than forest reserves" is a contradiction of terms, because they are not a part of the public lands.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Has it been so universally considered?

Mr. MONDELL. Absolutely.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I wanted to make it certain that the Agricultural Department is authorized directly to give protection to lands. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL SUPPLIES FOR RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill 2708, as amended, in the hands of the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2708) to authorize the President to transfer certain medical supplies for the relief of the distressed and famine-stricken people of Russia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer, without charge therefor, out of the surplus supplies of the War and other departments of the Government, to American relief organizations to be selected by him, medicines, medical, surgical, and hospital supplies, for the relief of the distressed and famine-stricken people of Russia, in an amount not to exceed $4,000,000 original cost to the United States, and as may be delivered to and accepted by such relief organizations, without cost for transportation to the United States, within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Wyoming has 20 minutes and the gentlemen from Arkansas 20 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, Senate bill 2708 reached the House on December 7, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and reported by that committee on December 12. The Committee on Military Affairs of the House saw fit to amend the bill somewhat, but the bill as amended, after further consideration, did not seem to be in an entirely satisfactory form. So after consulation with the chairman and other members of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Speaker, and various Members of the House I made a draft changing somewhat the phraseology of the act, but carrying out the general purpose of the Senate and of the House. The measure now presented differs from the Senate bill in that it fixes a limit of $4,000,000 of original cost to the volume of goods that may be transferred, and it fixes a definite time—four months from the time of its passage—within which the transfer must be made and the supplies accepted. It modifies the House bill in that, instead of placing the matter under the Secretary of the Department of Commerce, it makes the President responsible for the transfer, as we did in the case of the Russian grain relief, the work to be carried on under such agencies as he may provide. I think we are all in sympathy with the relief proposed, and the question has been one simply of form and phraseology.

Unless there is some gentleman who desires to ask a question in regard to the matter, I shall consume no further time.

Mr. QUIN. What is the exact change in the language in the House bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know whether the gentleman heard what I just said or not——

Mr. QUIN. I just came in.

Mr. MONDELL. We modified the Senate bill in that we limit the sum total of the goods that can be transferred to supplies of an original cost of $4,000,000. We further amend the Senate bill by providing that the transfer shall be made and the supplies accepted within four months. Those are the essential changes in the Senate bill.

Mr. QUIN. That is for surgical instruments?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and medicine and medical supplies. That is all that is provided for. We change the House bill by placing the entire matter under the President, instead of under one of the members of the Cabinet.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Where are these supplies located now?

Mr. MONDELL. These supplies are in the various supply depots of the War Department. There is, perhaps, a limited amount of them in the supply depots of the Navy Department. They are supplies that have been declared surplus.

Mr. GARNER. How do you expect these supplies to be gotten to the parties for whose benefit it is contemplated to send them?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, they are expected to take them and accept them at the supply depots.

Mr. GARNER. Who is going to pay the expense of transferring them to Russia, for instance?

Mr. MONDELL. The organizations.

Mr. GARNER. What organizations?

Mr. MONDELL. The organizations the President may select; there are several. There is the organization known as the American Relief Administration in Russia. There is an organization of the Friends, the Quakers, that are doing a great work in Russia. There is at least one other American organization working in the Volga Basin.

Mr. GARNER. They are to furnish the money to transport those supplies from their present location to Russia?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. They have stated that they are perfectly willing to do that, and glad to do that.

Mr. GARNER. I was just wondering if they were to be sent over in the regular commercial trade, or whether they were to go over in vessels owned by the Shipping Board, and if so, whether or not they are to have a reduced rate. Can the gentleman tell us anything about that?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, that was a very important matter as regards the transport of several million bushels of grain. It is not so important a matter in the transportation of medical supplies, which would go in smaller quantities. I suppose these relief associations will make such arrangements as seem to them wise for the transportation of these goods.

The Senate bill specifically provided that there should be no cost to the United States Government in the matter of transportation. The bill now before us follows the Senate bill in that respect.

Mr. GARNER. It retains that provision?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Now, in reference to the $20,000,000 appropriated for the purpose of buying grain, is this grain being carried to Russia in American bottoms free?

Mr. MONDELL. Frankly, I am not fully informed in that matter, but I do not understand that the grain is being carried free. There may be some arrangement whereby a reasonable or low rate is made.

Mr. GARNER. That is what I am coming to. I think the gentleman who is responsible for that legislation ought—at least at some time—to inform the House as to what the ultimate cost has been to the people of the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. I would be very glad to.

Mr. GARNER. As I understand it, the $20,000,000 worth of grain will cost somewhere in the neighborhood of $6,000,000 to transport to Europe, and that the people of the United States will be charged up with that. But by reason of the fact that a rate has been given in foreign bottoms by the Shipping Board that will not pay the cost of transportation the result is that the American people will have to pay the transportation.

Mr. MONDELL. The Russian relief bill contemplated the delivery of the grain to Russia.

Mr. GARNER. But did it not contemplate that the total expense to the American people should be $20,000,000; that you should buy the grain and retain sufficient of the $20,000,000 to deliver it to the people of Russia?

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that the total expense will not exceed $20,000,000.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. What does the gentleman mean by "surplus supplies"?

Mr. MONDELL. Supplies that are declared surplus by the departments. Under the provisions of law the War Department and the Navy Department from time to time declare certain supplies surplus, and when we refer to "surplus supplies" we refer to supplies so declared surplus.

Mr. LAYTON. Are these so-called surplus supplies defective in some way, so that we can not use them in this country? And if we give away $4,000,000 of those surplus supplies, will not that require that the taxables of the country will have to make that up in future appropriation bills?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I do not understand these supplies are defective. The War Department, as to Medical supplies, has declared surplus, as I understand it, such portion of its supplies as can not, in their opinion or in their judgment, be utilized by the department within a period in which those supplies will remain in a wholly satisfactory condition. These supplies are all right now, but we have such quantities of them—as, for instance, in the case of disinfectants—such quantities of them that in addition to providing for all of our needs for a very considerable time and so far in the future as the department feels that these supplies would remain in good condition, we have more than is needed, and those extra supplies are the supplies declared surplus.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman answer another question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. In the last Congress and in this Congress have we made any specific appropriation for these various supplies or supplies of a similar character?

Mr. MONDELL. Out of our general appropriation, of course, the War Department can purchase supplies; but we must assume—and I have no doubt but that it is true—that the War Department has not purchased articles similar or of the same character as those they have on hand, nor have they purchased where the articles on hand would serve the purposes of the department.

Mr. LAYTON. But the gentleman can not say of his own knowledge that that has not been done?

Mr. MONDELL. One can not know all the details of administration, but I hope that it has not been done.

With regard to these medical supplies, let me say further that the department has been endeavoring to sell them, and, judging from the offers it has received, the department seems to be of the opinion that we could sell these supplies, probably taking them all together, for perhaps 25 per cent of what they cost. This is not because they are not in good condition but because the trades could only use such supplies slowly.

Mr. LAYTON. And that it is not a good thing to do that because it would interfere with the general trade?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SEARS. I find that wherever there are charitable hospitals in this country there are weekly and monthly drives for the purpose of raising funds to secure medicine and supplies. Does not the gentleman believe it is about time that we give some of this relief at home and quit sending it to Russia? Our citizens have to contribute the money.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, that is a matter that gentlemen could discuss at very great length as a question of policy or principle. What we are doing now or proposing to do is to endeavor to furnish some relief to Russia. Of course, these supplies can be purchased very cheaply so far as they are needed at home. They are constantly being purchased at a low figure by those organizations that need them in the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Has the gentleman given any consideration to the proposition to include in legislation of this character the sending over of great quantities of foodstuffs which are canned, and which are still surplus in the War Department? I understand they have on hand 11,000,000 pounds of dehydrated potatoes for which they can not get a reasonable bid.

Mr. MONDELL. That has been considered, but what we are considering now is this legislation which deals with nothing but medical supplies. The people who are interested and anxious about it are doing splendid work for the people in Russia, and they buy these very supplies from the department at a low figure, and so far they have asked only this relief.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. These supplies are designed to be sent over there to help to save the lives of people who are sick?

Mr. MONDELL. They are people who are in a very desperate condition.

Mr. WALSH. Is it expected that they will arrive there in time to be of any material benefit?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it would have been better if we could have passed this legislation a little earlier.

Mr. WALSH. We passed similar legislation at the outbreak of the war.

Mr. MONDELL. But talking within the last three days with the representatives of several organizations that are doing relief work in Russia, they told me that they could still use the supplies with very great advantage, and they were very hopeful that they would be able to get them.

Mr. WALSH. They are doing all this work with the money of somebody else, and the representatives of these organizations always have great hopes of what they can do if somebody else puts up the money.

Mr. MONDELL. I have a great deal of confidence myself in these good folks—I think they are in the main good folks—who have an inclination to use their energies and devote their time to these works of mercy. As the gentleman knows, there is a condition, particularly in the Volga Basin of Russia, that almost baffles description. If conditions are as bad as they have been described to me, we ought to do everything we can in reason for their relief. They are so horrible that one is loath to hear of them.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the conditions may baffle description, but these people are always able to describe them in a sufficient manner so that they can get an appropriation out of the Federal Treasury. They are never so baffling but what they can come up to that requirement. We have some conditions at home that do not baffle description. We have sickness and unemployment and starvation, but I do not hear many of these good people representing these associations raising their voices concerning those conditions.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that there is not under this flag an individual anywhere who can not and will not be reached with some reasonably sufficient aid and assistance if greatly suffering or in need. On the other hand, here is a condition overseas that is horrible almost beyond belief; and the gentleman from Massachusetts I know is such a kind-hearted individual that except for the fact that just now he is acting very properly in the capacity of a guardian of the Treasury he himself would be disposed to offer this resolution.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I should be glad to yield to the gentleman, but my time has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, for one, I did not favor the Congress of the United States putting up $20,000,000 for Russia, but this measure to turn over to the American Relief Society certain medical supplies and surgical instruments for the afflicted who are dying by the thousands in the Volga Basin is a proposition that I do favor. As a member of the Military Affairs Committee I heard the evidence upon which this House bill is based. Every man knows that there is no one on this floor who believes more strongly than I do in conserving the property of the United States and in the economical administration of this Government.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I have not the time right now. Wait until I get through.

The United States Government has in its warehouses a large amount of medical supplies and surgical instruments for which the Government claims to have no use. These supplies are depreciating daily in value and are costing this Government immense sums to protect by watchmen and insurance. According to the evidence there are at least 1,400,000 half starved, under the care of the American Relief Commission, and in some cases entirely starved children over in the Volga Basin in Russia, who are suffering from the worst diseases known to humanity.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Not yet. The people of that country are not suffering from typhus and cholera by any voluntary act of themselves, but it is because nature failed to provide the rain and the snows to produce the crops in that region of country. As the result of the lack of food for the people typhus and cholera have become an epidemic. People from the United States who belong to this relief association, God-fearing women and men, are ministering to the wants and endeavoring to save the lives of these poor starving children. Up to September 22 there were 1,200,000 under the charge of the American Relief Association. It is estimated that they will have at least 200,000 more than that number. Cholera, and that dreaded disease typhus, can be carried by the chinch bug, which gets into the clothing of the poor people and is disseminated. Trains are run from that territory out into other countries of Europe. They can come that way into the United States.

I maintain that as a safeguard against that dreaded disease getting here on the boats through some port of the United States like the influenza did, it behooves the Congress of the United States to furnish these medicines and these supplies that we do not need to the poor and starving and helpless children in the Volga Basin.

Will it be wasted, as some have suggested? Mr. Hoover, under whose charge this will be directly distributed, is at the head of that business. His long experience justifies the statement that not one dollar's worth of these medical supplies will be wasted. Does any man believe that the women who go into this dreaded territory and risk their lives will waste any money while ministering to the dying children? Our good women and men engaged in that work, at the risk of their lives, are performing a work of love, charity, and mercy. God bless them. I know they will not waste any of this medicine. The evidence shows that poor little children would be huddled together in a house, 15 or 20 of them in one little bare room. The American Relief Association has taken charge of buildings and are making them as well as possible under the circumstances; and while they are not able to give them an entire meal they can give them enough black bread and condensed milk to keep life in them, so that when these medicines and surgical instruments are received they will be able to save the lives of the great majority of them in that particular portion of Russia.

The evidence showed that one child would die and another by its side would die, sometimes seven or eight would be dead lying side by side. Is there a man on this floor who is so heartless that he would vote against this great, rich Government allowing what has been declared by the War Department of this Government to be surplus turned over to these God-fearing men and women who are there working to save the lives of these disease-stricken people?

Is it possible that the American Congress, which ought to have its eyes turned toward the rehabilitation of that great country, even if only for a business and commercial reason, would vote against the saving of the lives of 1,400,000 children that are under the direct charge of these good men and women who compose the American Relief Association? Is there a man with a heart hard enough to vote against the turning over of these supplies that have been declared surplus for the needs of the War Department? What better use can be given than to turn these medicines and these surgical instruments over to the American Relief Commission and let them do that work of mercy in Russia? I maintain as a selfish proposition that it is good business for this Government to do it, and surely no man can oppose it on any constitutional ground, because you have expended money out of the Treasury of the United States for every known and some unknown purposes, and here is a purpose that goes to the actual saving of human lives, to a number of more than 1,400,000.

There was not an ally that sacrificed more men than did Russia for two or three years at the beginning of the Great War. It is true that the Government broke down at the last; but, my friends, with that great country undeveloped and that horrible disaster coming in the nature of a drought over that territory, it has brought the people to starvation, and the process of starvation has brought typhus and cholera. Can we as representatives of the great citizenship of the United States turn our backs on that suffering humanity and say we will not turn over to them or to this worthy commission the $4,000,000 worth of medicine and supplies that the Government of the United States or its agents have said are now worth only 25 cents on the dollar, for that is all they could get for it at any sale in the United States? Can we as representatives of a great constituency, as representatives of a Christian people, of a God-fearing people, representing the people whose hearts go out to the call of humanity at all times, can we turn down a proposition and say that we will let 1,400,000 children under the charge of the relief commission die with disease, die for the lack of medical attention, because even if they have the scanty food to sustain life they can not prevent the ravages of the disease unless they have the medical and the surgical instruments.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I will yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman voted against the appropriation of $20,000,000 to buy grain for Russia?

Mr. QUIN. No; I was sick and was not able to vote.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understood the gentleman to say he was not in favor of it.

Mr. QUIN. I was not.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman is in favor of physicking them instead of feeding them, and with physic that is not worth but 25 cents on the dollar.

Mr. QUIN. I want to say to the gentleman that this proposition is for medicine and supplies which we have on hand that is surplus, and the War Department does not need, that are to go to the sick and dying children. The gentleman understands the distinction between giving money that Congress did not have on hand, but would have to raise by taxation, and this proposition of putting surplus medicines already on hand, of no service to the Government, into worthy hands to save the lives of a million children of our neighbors.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is not food more important than that?

Mr. QUIN. Oh, but the gentleman understands that they have arrangements to get food. They have not the arrangements to get this medicine and these surgical supplies, and this Government can do it without any hurt or violation of any principle known to our Government. The American Government, standing as it does the one country in the world whose money is worth par on the exchanges to-day, the one Government that has more medicine than our people will need, the one Government of all the Governments that went through this Great War which is able to meet its tax burden, although the Congress has added on many burdens which I do not think belong there, ought I think now to respond to the cry of these children, living in a country that was our ally and that did valiant service in time of need to save civilization?

Yet some men here say that it is improper for this Government to turn over these old supplies that are worthless to us now and we could not use in peace times, knowing that when we turn down the bill it means death, disaster, and the further spread of the horrible disease that afflict these people, and also the danger that it may come to our own shores, if it becomes any worse than it is to-day.

Gentlemen of the House, in the name of a great people that compose the districts of all the men who sit as Members of this body, I ask that you mantain the honor of the United States and further prove to the people of the world that our Nation stands as the forerunner in charity and good works to all the people of the world.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does my friend from Mississippi know of anyone who is opposed to this resolution?

Mr. QUIN. Yes; many are opposed to it. I heard some say that they were, and I heard some say they were going to vote against it. Could not the gentleman tell from the interrogations put to the Republican leader when he was on the floor that some are opposed to it? I certainly hoped that it would be passed by a unanimous vote, and that the United States of America would continue to hold that position which she has always held in the Christian world and the constellation of God-fearing nations of this earth. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FESS). The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 65, noes 7.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

SNOQUALMIE NATIONAL FOREST.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8999) to authorize exchanges of lands within the Snoqualmie National Forest, in the State of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] why it is that this measure does not contain the precautions which were suggested in the other bill which we considered earlier in the day?

Mr. SINNOTT. I do not recall the restrictions suggested in the other bill.

Mr. WALSH. They were read to the gentleman.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HADLEY. While the gentleman from Oregon is looking up the other bill, I would state that I introduced this bill and based it on the form of the bill which the House passed at the last session of the Congress, a bill that was applicable to the Rainier National Forest, except that in this bill as introduced there is a limitation of 1 mile on either side of the State highway, the purpose being to preserve the timber within such limit. The forest department in its report, which is set out in the report of the committee, recommended that the limitation be removed and that it be made applicable to the forest at large as was done in the case of other forests. To that I made no objection, calling it to the attention of the committee at the time and stating that it was agreeable to me, as the author of the bill, that the limitation be removed. If the gentleman desires to know anything of the circumstances, I would be glad to state them; but upon the point he mentioned, that is the history of the introduction and recommendation of the bill by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. How many tracts are there in this forest to which this would apply?

Mr. HADLEY. The Snoqualmie National Forest, as I understand it, embraces about a million acres. About two-thirds of it is in Government ownership and about one-third of it, speaking in round figures, is in private ownership. The Snoqualmie Forest lies on the western slope of the Cascade Range of Mountains, dropping down into the valleys that lead into the city of Seattle, in King County, State of Washington. There is a State highway approximately starting at the Snoqualmie Pass on the eastern side of the reservation, which crosses this forest area, established by the act of the legislature, and practically all of the finest timber in the forest bordering the highway happens to be in private ownership—that is, to the extent that it parallels this highway. It is the desire of the people who are interested in preserving the scenic features of the State forest areas and other areas to preserve this timber now in the vicinity of this highway. One of the great scenic features is the timber. There are, of course, the mountain peaks and the streams, but the crowning distinction of the highway is the splendid growth of timber near it. If fire came, or if in the ordinary course of logging operations the timber be removed, it will destroy one of the greatest features of interest along the highway. The hazard of fire is a very important element. The interlocking of the private area with the Government area and the logging operations which necessarily attend it at the hands of private owners maintain a continual fire menace. In this situation it is only a matter of time when fire will sweep over this area and destroy it. The gentleman must himself remember having crossed the Cascade Range, traveling on the Milwaukee Road. I was in company with him at the time. He may remember the broad area across that range that has been burned over, where fire has destroyed many trees and other trees are standing that are dead. It is a desolate area. That will be the fate of the entire area along this highway unless some such precaution as this bill contemplates be arranged for.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's understanding that notwithstanding the elimination of this limitation by amendment, the exchanges will be confined to the adjacent territory along this highway?

Mr. HADLEY. Of course, with the removal of the limitation it will be quite possible to make the exchange of private lands anywhere in the area. The provisions of the bill are, in effect, just briefly stated, that the Secretary of the Interior would be authorized by patent to grant other lands in other national forests, of equal value, in exchange for those which may be vested in the United States through him, or the Secretary of Agriculture may exchange timber of equal value, upon having it granted here, for timber of equal value in other national forests, and the valuation to be determined in each instance by the Secretary of Agriculture. Then these lands so exchanged in the Snoqualmie Forest which are in private ownership become a part of the Government title and part of the national forests.

Mr. WALSH. It will not result in conserving any of the timber if it is done?

Mr. HADLEY. It will conserve the timber in the jurisdiction of the Government. The United States will become the owner of the timber in so far as it may be exchanged. This bill makes that permissive. If private owners are willing, after the passage of this bill, to vest the title in the Government in exchange for lands of equal value, they may do so, and it only gives the opportunity to people who are interested in retaining these scenic features to prevent the destruction and elimination of these beautiful spots in nature, so that they may be preserved for the public.

Mr. WALSH. But it permits this timber in other areas to be cut and moved?

Mr. HADLEY. That would be in areas where there is timber of equal value, but where scenic features are not necessarily involved. The same organization which is looking out for this is interested in every area of analogous character in the State, namely, the National Parks Association of the State, having officers and representatives stationed in every part of the State. They are working with what I think is commendable State pride, having in view the preservation of all the scenic features of the State for the future, especially where they are being denuded.

Mr. WALSH. Well, if we are going to try to preserve timber and preserve the scenery, why should they move a private owner from one section of this forest to another? Why not buy him out, and then they will have the entire territory?

Mr. HADLEY. I think if the bill provided to buy him out the gentleman would object to that on account of the necessary appropriation. I think the exchange should be permitted for lands of equal value wherever the parties are willing.

Mr. WALSH. Has it ever been suggested that in doing this you are going to make the national forests a sort of checkerboard, by moving these private owners from, say, this tract over yonder, and they will stay there and absorb what benefit they can get out of that, and then want to go somewhere else, and by and by it will be that they will have occupied a large portion of the forests?

Mr. HADLEY. I am not personally disposed to be particular as to what the ultimate result will be under a policy of this kind. But I am willing to meet every case as it arises on the merits of each bill and pass upon it. And that is what is presented here.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw my reservation of the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Washington yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I will.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the bill is endeavoring to make exchanges so as to preserve the timber along this highway?

Mr. HADLEY. That is the real purpose, and the only purpose, of the bill.

Mr. MANN. The people who now own the timber in private ownership will eventually cut it anyhow. The desire is to put their holdings back from the road, if they will exchange?

Mr. HADLEY. That is it, and they may take exchanges in other forest areas if they desire.

Mr. MANN. I notice in the report made on this bill by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] it says this hazard may be largely avoided by "consolidation of holidays."

Mr. HADLEY. I noticed that. It is a typographical error, of course. The word "holdings" is the word in common use in our State in speaking of such logged-off and timber lands. I know it was intended to be "holdings."

Mr. MANN. I wanted the gentleman to state that. I do not know but that it would be a good thing, however, to consolidate the holidays. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I will.

Mr. RAKER. This bill stands practically the same as the other exchange bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HADLEY. I have never examined personally, I believe, any other, except one.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call attention now to the fact that about an hour ago there was considerable criticism of a bill reported by the same committee. This bill carried practically the same proposition, except with the addition of other lands carried in the bill, so that the people might know the land that was to be exchanged. Here we allow privately owned land in the forests to be exchanged for other lands in any other forests, which is all right, and it makes no provision as to other conditions, but simply allows the exchange as in the other exchange bills.

All these other exchange bills have the same thing in them as this bill, which was just stricken out, namely, to provide a certain strip of virgin timber along these highways. My distinguished friend, who is so anxious that legislation should be included in a general bill now before the Committee on Agriculture, forgets that this is in the same class of bills. So while our friends are so particular and squeamish on a public road located in another latitude, when you go a little north it does not make any difference. It is all right. I am for the gentleman's bill. It is proper legislation, but it just shows how easily we can twist our minds and how wrong it is to preserve timber in one State and how all right it is in another for the same purpose and the same object. And our dear friend, who sometimes has objections, reads a report, and under the specific designation of the manual we find the report striking out certain language and entering the language that is to be inserted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order, and I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I desire to get some information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has been recognized. The gentleman from California is out of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Under this bill will authority be granted to exchange forest lands for cut-over lands, as some of these bills permit?

Mr. HADLEY. This bill is self-explanatory. It permits the exchange of lands of equal value or an exchange of lands for timber.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Under its provisions would the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to exchange well-timbered lands for cut-over lands?

Mr. HADLEY. I submit to the gentleman whether he would not be willing to trust the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior to determine the question?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I would be perfectly willing to do that if they had the time to go out there and look at the land. As I understand it, in most of these exchanges the purpose has been to take good timber land belonging to the Government and exchange it for cut-over land belonging to private parties. We have had some hearings before the Committee on Agriculture with reference to these lands, and it has been developed at those hearings, according to the testimony of those interested in timber, that land when it is cut over is practically worthless except for grazing purposes.

Mr. HADLEY. That depends entirely upon its locality and the surface conditions.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The testimony of witnesses from the States of Washington and Oregon and California and other States out there was to the effect that when the timber is cut off the land it is worth only two or three dollars per acre, or whatever it will bring for grazing purposes, and in many instances the owners let the land go back to the State rather than keep on paying the taxes on it after the timber is removed.

The testimony also shows that the timbered land in many instances is worth anywhere from $40 to $100 per acre. Does the Government ever get in exchange 20 or 30 or 40 acres of the cut-over land for 1 acre of the timbered land in cases of that kind?

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman evidently has not read the bill. On page 2 of the bill the gentleman will find that the Secretary of Agriculture may permit the grantor to cut and remove an equal amount of national-forest timber in any national forest in the State of Washington, the values in each instance to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, and to be acceptable to the owner as fair compensation. That is not therefore applicable to the logged-off lands in terms. It speaks of timber itself.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, I have read it, and it also authorizes the Government to trade lands.

Mr. HADLEY. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to do that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I mean it authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, when he can trade timberlands for cut-over lands, to acept title to any of the land that he sees fit.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman also knows that a patent could not issue to anything except the land. The timber is only a part of the land. It must be all-embracing and carrying the real estate. The other provision relates to the timber itself. The whole bill shows on its face that the exchange must be for equal value.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I also understand that the Secretary of the Interior can accept on behalf of the United States any land not owned by the Government within these national forests. There are 300,000 acres of privately owned land within the national forest. Much of it is cut-over land.

Under the stipulations of this bill the Secretary of Agriculture will be authorized to accept any of this cut-over land and exchange it in lieu of timberland. In doing that has it been the custom to require them to give 20 or 30 acres to 1?

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman need have no fear of the Government parting with title to valuable timberland in exchange for logged-over land unless it has equivalent value.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I can answer "yes" to the question of the gentleman from Texas. That is exactly what the Forest Service does.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Has it been getting anything like the near value?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. It has done more than that. They have never gone above $2 an acre for the cut-over land. Sometimes it has been appraised as low as $1 per acre.

Mr. JONES of Texas. What do they value the timbered lands at on the average?

Mr. SINNOTT. That would depend on the stumpage. In some quarter sections of this land there is 3,000,000 feet of timber, and in some of the other quarter sections in those localities it will run as high as 20,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Has it been the custom in making these exchanges to get 20,000 or 30,000 acres of cut-over lands in exchange for 1,000 acres of timberland?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. They measure the actual value.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The reason why I ask these questions is that the testimony shows that really the cut-over land for timber purposes is of no value whatever. The timber companies feel that they can not go forward and reforest this land, and the only value to it is its grazing value, which is very small; and the testimony shows that in many instances the timber companies and other private owners, if they can not dispose of the land to the Government in some way by exchange, allow it to go back to the State rather than pay the taxes on it.

Mr. SINNOTT. This land has great value for reforestation purposes. No private individual, of course, can hold it for that purpose, but the Government may do so profitably. Most of this land will reforest itself.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I know; but if the Government can get it for a mere song by paying for it, I was wondering if they would get equal value for it when they attempted to trade it.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. I have some figures in my office covering some of the exchanges that have been made.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I wish the gentleman would bring them over some time and put them in the RECORD.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; I will.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands not in Government ownership within the Snoqualmie National Forest and located within 1 mile of the Sunset Highway, as established by the Legislature of the State of Washington, session of 1915, if, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, such lands are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may issue patent for not to exceed an equal value of Government land within any national forest within the State of Washington; or the Secretary of Agriculture may permit the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of national forest timber in any national forest in the State of Washington, the values in each instance to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, and to be acceptable to the owner as fair compensation. Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the direction of and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the Snoqualmie National Forest.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "Forest," strike out the words "and located within 1 mile of the Sunset Highway, as established by the Legislature of the State of Washington, session of 1915."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HADLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MONONGAHELA RIVER, PITTSBURGH, PA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8818) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Pittsburgh, a municipal corporation of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near its junction with the Allegheny River in the city of Pittsburgh, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of Pittsburgh, a municipal corporation of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge, with approaches thereto, across the Monongahela River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near its junction with the Allegheny River, in the city of Pittsburgh, in the county of Allegheny, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS PAMUNKEY RIVER, VA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9050) granting the consent of Congress to the Pamunkey Ferry Co. to construct a bridge across the Pamunkey River, in Virginia.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Pamunkey Ferry Co., duly incorporated under the laws of Virginia, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Pamunkey River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Sweet Hall, in King William County, to a point opposite in New Kent County, in the Commonwealth of Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONTAGUE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE OVER COLUMBIA RIVER, OREG. AND WASH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2776) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Columbia River at a point approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon, to a point on the opposite shore of the State of Washington.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to make a few remarks. I notice that the title of this bill provides for the construction of a bridge over the Columbia River—at a point approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon.

In the phraseology of the bill itself there is no reference whatsoever to the construction of a bridge at a point approximating the designation in the title. There is no reference to Dalles City and no reference to Wasco County and no reference to 5 miles upstream from the designated city. This is a Senate bill, which perhaps explains the reason for this difficulty. In the enacting language of the bill we find the following:

At a point suitable to the interests of navigation approximately in either section 29 or 30.

Perhaps the distinguished Senator from the State of Oregon, who had been occupied recently in determining what position he might take on some important questions pending in the Senate, was not giving attention to these little matters, and therefore failed to insert the words—

approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County—

Which would make the bill intelligible or at least in consonance with the title. If the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] is acquainted with the purpose of this bill I will yield to him to explain whether this was an oversight or whether the bill is intended to have this vague phraseology. Or I will yield to him to defend any person in another body for having permitted this slipshod legislation.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, they are not entitled to any defense here. [Laughter.]

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I think the bill as originally introduced in the Senate contained the phraseology which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] thinks it should have contained, but on the recommendation of the Assistant Secretary of War certain language was stricken from the bill, which, in the opinion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, leaves it somewhat ambiguous.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I will not stand that arraignment, because the letter contained in the report shows that my position is well taken. The gentleman may try to cover up the shortcomings of some friend of his in another body, but he is not going to throw that obloquy upon me.

Mr. SINNOTT. I am merely endeavoring to accentuate the carefulness of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I had rather the gentleman would emphasize the shortcomings of his friend in the other body.

Mr. SINNOTT. But, as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the description—in either section 29 or 30—

necessarily makes it about 5 miles upstream from Dalles City. It gives the section, the range, and the meridian, and that can be only one place in the United States. So that makes the description as definite as anyone can desire. At present they are uncertain whether they desire the abutments on the Oregon side to be constructed in section 29 or in section 30. It will take a more careful survey to determine that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What does "approximately in either section 29 or 30" mean?

Mr. STAFFORD. The word "approximately" is what we are talking about.

Mr. SINNOTT. The original bill contained the language—

at a point approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why can not that language be retained? The report of the Secretary of War states that he has no objection to the construction of a bridge over the Columbia River at a point approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, to a point on the opposite shore.

Mr. SINNOTT. That would be in either section 29 or section 30. It does not make any difference whether those words are in there or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. The word "approximately" is the question before the House.

Mr. SINNOTT. The entire matter is under the supervision of the Secretary of War.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to inquire whether it is necessary to have the other language eliminated, which is found in line 10. It goes on and says:

At a point suitable to the interests of navigation, approximately in either section 29 or 30, township 2 north of range 14 east, Willamette meridian, and from the point of beginning on the Oregon shore of said river—

From the point of beginning. Of course, we expect to have it from some point, because this says: "construct a bridge at a point suitable for navigation." Why repeat and be guilty of tautology?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I think this discussion has gone far enough. If the gentleman wants the amendments in he can offer them.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am asking information from some one to see if the amendments are not worthy of adoption before the time for objection to the bill is passed.

Mr. SINNOTT. I have no objection to the gentleman's amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That The Dalles Oregon-Washington Toll Bridge Co., a corporation of the State of Oregon, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized jointly or separately to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto over the Columbia River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation approximately in either section 20 or 29, township 2 north of range 14 east, Willamette meridian, and from the point of beginning on the Oregon shore of said river, thence running in a northerly direction to a suitable landing in the State of Washington and on the Washington side of said Columbia River, and all in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The Clerk read the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "section" eliminate the words "twenty or," and after the words "twenty-nine" insert the words "or thirty."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman who made the report on this bill when it was discovered that this section 20 should be changed to 30? The bill was introduced, passed the Senate, passed the War Department, passed the Chief of Engineers, who recommended the bill to have a bridge in section 20 or 29. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, without any information which it has given to the House, changed the location of the bridge entirely, from section 20 to section 29 or 30.

Mr. MAPES. The information came from very good authority, the gentleman from Oregon, a Member of the House. I assume it was not discovered until after the bill had passed the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Well, it passed the Senate and passed the War Department with section 20 in it. Evidently somebody was not very careful, and therefore I wondered whether the Committee on Interstate Commerce was careful because they gave no information to the House upon the subject.

Mr. MAPES. It was an error in the description, and the fact that it was an error we thought would be sufficient information. The only information we could give was the correction of the language of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Was there ever supposed to be a bridge at this point, either mythological or otherwise?

Mr. MAPES. I have no information on that subject.

Mr. SINNOTT. There was a "Bridge of the Gods," 40 miles west of this place.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to insert in line 8, after the word "approximately," the words "5 miles upstream from Dallas City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have a further amendment in the last line of page 1 and first line of page 2, to strike out the language "from the point of beginning."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "meridian," strike out the words "and from the point of beginning."

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose in striking that out?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because it is not necessary. I purpose to strike out not only the language I have indicated but the words in line 2, "thence running in a northerly direction," so that it will read: "construct a bridge at a point suitable to the interests of navigation in either section 29 or 30, township 2 north, of range 14 east, Willamette meridian, to a suitable landing opposite in the State of Washington."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that the section is going to read any better, even after the handiwork of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill says construct a bridge on the Oregon shore of said river, thence running northerly. My intention is to have the usual phraseology, to have it read: "construct a bridge at a point suitable to the interests of navigation in either section 29 or 30, township 2 north, of range 14 east, Willamette meridian, on the Oregon shore of said river, to a suitable landing opposite in the State of Washington, in accordance with the provisions of the act," and so forth.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Apparently the author of the bill thought a bridge should be described like a plot of land, by metes and bounds.

Mr. STAFFORD. Probably. I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] will agree that the language suggested is better.

Mr. MANN. But it does not make very good grammar.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it does.

Mr. MANN. "At a point to a point" does not make good diction.

Mr. STAFFORD. "At a point to a suitable landing opposite."

Mr. MANN. One could say "from a point to a point," but not "at a point to a point."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin again reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported Mr. STAFFORD'S amendment.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been considered by the Senate committee and the House committee and has been submitted to the War Department, and it strikes me that the language the gentleman from Wisconsin has suggested, with all due deference, does not improve the language of the bill, and that it is better to abide by the recommendations of the committee than to attempt to amend the bill is this way on the floor of the House.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is it not fair to the War Department to call attention to the fact that their letter included in the report of the Committee of the House was written before the Senate bill was passed, and that in that letter reference is made to some indications in red ink on a document which is not before us? The War Department report is dated December 9, 1921, and the letter states that the department has no objection to the bill as amended, as indicated in red thereon. We have not got the red.

Mr. MAPES. The reference of the War Department, I think, is to the clause relating to the 5 miles upstream which has been reinserted. The usual practice of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in reporting bridge bills is to use the language "at or near" a certain point. It is not practicable to instruct the War Department to put these bridges at any particular point. That is left to the judgment of the engineers of the War Department after they have made the surveys and approved of the plans. This language of the Senate differs somewhat from the House committee's practice, but the committee did not think it was of enough importance to justify changing the Senate bill, and therefore reported it in the same way in which it came over from the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. It has to go back to the Senate anyway, because there is a House amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The last two bills just passed by the House have exactly the same language as that suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin. They authorize the construction of bridges "at a point to a point," if the gentleman will refer back.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 2, noes 16.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 5, after the word "authorized," strike out the words "jointly or separately."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the gentleman reporting this bill can make some explanation as to this unwarranted language.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago I offered an amendment—which was voted down because of the action of the gentleman reporting the bill—to conform to the established language of bills reported from his committee. I had no purpose to criticize the gentleman who reported the bill. My only purpose was to have the language conform to that used in bridge bills, and now we find language here that has hardly any meaning.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at present. The bill is to authorize The Dalles Oregon-Washington Toll Bridge Co. to construct a bridge, and yet we find that they are jointly or separately authorized to do it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, it is intended that this bridge company, its successors and assigns, shall jointly and severally perform the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps the gentleman from Michigan can offer some explanation for that language.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, of course we are all delighted to hear from the gentleman from Wisconsin at all times, and far be it from any of us to deprive him of the opportunity to make a speech. As soon as he offered the amendment I suggested that so far as I am concerned I was willing to accept it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer to amend the title so as to harmonize with the phraseology, by striking out the word "of," in the last line of the title and inserting therein the word "in."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment to the title, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD offers the following amendment to the title: In the last line of the title strike out the word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "in."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the word "of" occurs twice in the last line of the title.

Mr. STAFFORD. The first "of" so as to remove obscurity in the minds of some gentlemen.

Mr. MAPES. The amendment would be obscure to all minds unless it specifies whether it applies to the first or the second "of."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE JUDICIAL CODE—AMENDING PLEADINGS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 1831, an act to amend section 237 of the Judicial Code.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, I am not able to understand from the report of the committee with respect to the bill exactly what is contemplated by the proposed amendment, and would like to have the explanation of the gentleman who is in charge of the measure.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Speaker, I will try to enlighten the gentleman if I can. This bill has passed the Senate. It has been approved by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of this country and also by the Attorney General. You have, of course, read the amendment, have you not? The purpose of the amendment is to provide a litigant the opportunity to amend his pleading before final judgment in the case where the supreme court of a State in reversing its previous holdings thereby renders a contract, valid at the time of its execution, invalid by reason of the next holding, in such manner as to preserve the right to carry the case on writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States in order to have the opinion of the Supreme Court upon the right of the party complaining to have his contract construed and upheld under and according to the law as proclaimed by the supreme court of the State at the time of the due execution of the contract.

Of course it will undoubtedly be conceded by everyone, lawyer or layman, that where a person enters into a contract under the law as it exists, according to the decisions of the highest court in the State, that he ought to have relief under that contract. But sometimes the supreme court reverses itself, and sometimes in the reversal of itself, while it ought to recognize that the contract under consideration was written in keeping with the law as it existed before it did reverse itself, and take care of that matter, it does not always do so. It is also well known that the pleading must contain the point or some showing made before it will be considered by the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error. The State court must have opportunity to pass on the question. This amendment or showing when made simply affords the complaining party an opportunity, after he learns that the supreme court of a State has reversed itself, to raise the question of the violation of the Constitution of the United States by the supreme court of a State, and giving to the Supreme Court of the United States the privilege of reviewing that question, and either affirming reversing, or remand with instructions.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, it raises the question of jurisdiction. The gentleman is endeavoring to change the rule of pleading so it will allow the Supreme Court to have jurisdiction to review a case, whereas if this amendment would not be put in the law they would not under the present practice.

Mr. BOIES. Under the present practice a party would not be provided a hearing on writ of error to the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then it does raise a jurisdictional question?

Mr. BOIES. What complaint does the gentleman have of the amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no complaint. I am just seeking some light on it; that is all. It involves a rather strong——

Mr. BOIES. We took the precaution to submit this matter to the Supreme Court of the United States, knowing they were a little jealous of their jurisdiction, and I have copies of the letters here from the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and also the Attorney General showing approval of the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What would prevent the litigants under the present practice from amending their pleadings?

Mr. BOIES. They have no right to amend them in the supreme court of a State.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the practice in my State a litigant can amend the pleading at any time before the matter comes to a final determination.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this: Before you can raise in the Supreme Court of the United States a constitutional question it must be pleaded. You must set it up in your plea in the suit and show what is involved. If you read the section to which this is an amendment, as it is copied in the report on this bill, you will see why it is necessary.

For the Supreme Court of the United States to take cognizance of that question it must be pleaded. But when a person goes into a State court relying on a contract that was valid at the time it was made and which he still considers valid, he is not going to set up a claim that it is not invalid. So he goes on and litigates upon the assumption that the court will adhere to its former views. He reaches the supreme court of a State, and it reverses its former holding. Then he has nothing in his pleadings to show that the constitutional question has been raised. Consequently when it goes up to the Supreme Court of the United States he can not comply with this section as it now stands. The real change is simply a change in practice, so that the constitutional question can be raised where it has not been pleaded, but it is only in those cases where there has been a reversal of a holding of a State court which was relied on in trying the action.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How long has it been on the statute books?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. A good many years.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What necessity has arisen for this amendment in actual practice?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I have been told that cases have occurred where you could not raise the question by reason of this situation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If this change is necessary in order to prevent a denial of justice to a bona fide litigant, I have no objection. My inquiry was made with a view to exposing the necessity of the change in the practice.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If a suit is brought after such former ruling has been reversed by the supreme court of the State, it can be pleaded. Of course, cases of that kind have gone to the Supreme Court of the United States, and then they have been given relief.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Speaker, I can say to the gentleman that there is a case pending now in the State of Iowa of considerable importance, that has brought to the attention of judges and lawyers the necessity for this amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was that particular case the basis of this proposed legislation, or was there a general demand in general practice for it?

Mr. BOIES. That case brought this matter to my attention, and I suppose to the attention of the Senator who introduced a bill in the Senate. But it seems to me it is easy to apprehend that a man ought to have the right to have a decision of the last court in the country upon any question. He ought to be permitted in the practice to present it so that he may have the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BOIES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The bill says, "If said claim is made in said court at any time before said final judgment is entered and if decision is against the claim so made." That is, the State court. How do we control the practice in the State courts? Is not that a matter for the State courts to determine, whether they are allowed to make a claim after the court has rendered a decision before it enters the final order?

Mr. BOIES. No. The practice in our State is that the testimony and pleading submitted to the Supreme Court can not be altered when you come to present your petition for a rehearing.

Mr. MANN. How are you going to make a claim then? Here a State court has given an opinion on which it shall enter an order. Now, the provision of the bill is that after the State court has given an opinion and before it has entered an order neither party can make the claim that it has violated the law of the United States. Is not that a matter for the State court to determine?

Mr. BOIES. No. The State court does not determine it for the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, the Supreme Court of the United States will not entertain the writ because it is not in the case, and the practice in the States does not permit an amendment. But if Congress adopts this amendment——

Mr. MANN. The claim must be made in the State court or this would not do any good.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Is it not true that in any State after an order has been made for judgment by the Supreme Court there is always an intermission of some days for the taxing of costs?

Mr. MANN. After the opinion has been rendered, before a final order is entered, there is some time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This provides that it shall be made before the judgment is rendered. The parties would be notified that a decision had been rendered, and thereupon they could file their claim. In most of the States there is provision for the rearguing or rehearing of a case, so that there will be an opportunity to file the claim. That is all that is necessary.

Mr. MANN. There is such a provision in other courts.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Do you claim an amendment could be filed by an amendment of the pleading or otherwise?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The Supreme Court has been strict in certain cases. Where there has been consideration of matters of this kind they have taken notice of claims that were not always quite in accordance with the rules.

Mr. BURTNESS. If a petition was made or a claim filed and hearings set, it would come under the provisions of this act?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes. I think that is the only way it could be raised. What is done in raising it in a State court is to set it up in the pleading.

Mr. BURTNESS. That question would not be in the pleading before the State court in the first instance?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Certainly, and consequently you would have to make the claim outside of the pleadings.

Mr. BOIES. Permit me to make this suggestion. It does not matter what the Supreme Court does in considering the petition for a rehearing. The attorney, being aware of this law as amended, will in the record make this claim before final judgment in order that the State court may be said to have had an opportunity to pass upon the question.

Mr. BURTNESS. And you do not intend by this law to establish any strict procedure in the State court? You simply use the general language that "when a claim is made." It can be made in a dozen ways.

Mr. BOIES. It does not touch the State court's practice in the first instance.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOIES. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The language of the bill is intentionally very broad in that respect. As my colleague has said, while the State law will not recognize the claim, the statute puts it simply in that broad form. It says "if a claim is made in a petition filed for a rehearing," but the claim is made to the court of the State?

Mr. BOIES. Yes. Before you can have a hearing in the Supreme Court of the United States you must have had a hearing in the State court, in some form, upon the constitutional question involved.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, this seems to be too important a piece of legislation to be considered by unanimous consent, and I therefore object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill retain its place upon the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill retain its place on the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER SHIP CANAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

By section 9 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1919, the Congress expressed a desire that the International Joint Commission investigate what further improvement of the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake

Ontario is necessary to make the river navigable for ocean-going vessels, together with the estimated cost thereof.

Under date of January 21, 1920, the Governments of the United States and Canada by agreement referred the matter to the International Joint Commission, pursuant to the provisions of article 9 of the treaty relating to the boundary waters between the United States and Canada, signed by the United States and Great Britain on January 11, 1909.

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress and for such action as it may deem appropriate, a report, bearing date of December 19, 1921, submitted to the Department of State by a letter of the joint secretaries of the commission, dated January 6, 1922, presenting the findings, conclusions, and recommendations of the commission regarding the matter.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 16, 1922.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, to what committee is that message to be referred?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to withhold the reference until he has an opportunity to determine that question.

NATIONAL SCREW THREAD COMMISSION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 227, extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of five years from March 21, 1922.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the term of the National Screw Thread Commission, created by an act approved July 18, 1918, as amended by an act approved March 3, 1919, is hereby extended for a period of five years from March 21, 1922.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have somebody beside the distinguished and eminent gentleman, part of whose testimony appears in the report, give some good reason why any such extension should be granted to a commission which was organized during the war and which we were told would be able to wind up and standardize most of the matters on which it was working in a very short time.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] probably can answer these questions. This is his bill.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the committee know?

Mr. VESTAL. I know about it, but I want my friend, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], to explain it to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman from Connecticut knows something about it. He is responsible for this legislation.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; and I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that I am very proud of it, for I think that the legislation has already accomplished a great deal of good.

Mr. WALSH. Then why not appoint the commission for life?

Mr. TILSON. I think it would be a very wise thing if the commission was continued indefinitely, although, so far as the work now in sight appears, five years will probably be a sufficient time to complete it.

Mr. WALSH. When the commission was created it was not even dreamed that it would take any considerable time. We extended the commission once, and at that time I recall that the gentleman from Connecticut stated that they were getting along so splendidly that they would wind up the matter very speedily.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman's statement is absolutely correct, and calls for an explanation, which I think that I can give so as to make the matter clear to the gentleman. It was contemplated, in the first place, that this commission would simply assemble the results of the best screw-thread practice and from these formulate what in the judgment of the commission would be the most practicable and satisfactory standards. It was expected that these standards would be published and probably accepted as the best result of any effort thus far made in the direction of standardization. The work thus outlined was done within a comparatively short time. The term of the commission had to be extended once, even to complete its work so far. As time went on the far-reaching importance of the work was more clearly realized; therefore, in order to be sure that the very best possible results would be obtained from these standards it was essential that they be actually tried out in the manufacture of screws and screw machinery equipment. This practical trial has been going on. The standards have been adopted quite enthusiastically by manufacturers all over the country, but in putting them into actual practice there have been discovered in rare instances slight modifications that it was thought would produce better results if they were adopted. These changes are being made from time to time by the commission. It is probable that not all the different types of screws for which standards have been formulated by the commission have been even yet put to the final test of actual practice. Some of them may have to wait for some months and perhaps years before they are put into actual practice, which, after all, is the very best way to determine whether they are the very best possible standards. It was also expected at first that standardization would be attempted only for those screws which are in most common use—that is, those of which the greatest quantity are produced. After this work was begun and was progressing with unexpected satisfaction, it was realized that there were a great number of special screws, such, for instance, as apply to pipes and couplings, to electric fixtures, and things of that sort, which it would be a good thing to have standardized also.

Then, as the gentleman will see if he will note Mr. Hoover's testimony, it occurred to the commission that if instead of having all sorts of sizes and shapes for the head of the bolt, if the heads of bolts were standardized as to shape and dimensions, it would reduce the number that need be carried in stock by dealers as well as the number of different kinds that need be manufactured.

Mr. WALSH. That is the idea of Mr. Hoover and not the idea of the commission, I understand.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, they are going into this phase of the matter.

Mr. WALSH. He probably inocculated them with the idea.

Mr. TILSON. The commission proposes also to go into the question of standardizing the material of which screws are made; that is, the wire and rods from which by means of automatic machinery screws are made. If these were standardized as to sizes it would reduce the number of sizes that need be manufactured and carried in stock; therefore it is believed that it would be extremely desirable to have standardization of material as well as product.

These are the things, I would say to my friend from Massachusetts, that the commission has already done and is still doing, and it is believed that if permitted to do so it will continue to do work of considerable importance for probably five years yet to come.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman if this commission has ever met?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes; during the first years of its existence it met frequently and held long sessions, but since then it has met more seldom, only as occasion required.

Mr. MANN. When was the last meeting?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know the exact date of the last meeting, but I know when the next one is to be, and that is to-morrow morning. I have been invited, and I should very much like to have the gentleman from Illinois go with me to the meeting. He would thoroughly appreciate what the commission is doing.

Mr. MANN. Who constitutes the commission?

Mr. TILSON. The commission at present is made up of the chairman, Dr. Stratton of the Bureau of Standards, two members from the War Department, two from the Navy Department, and four civilian members appointed by the Secretary of Commerce—two of them nominated from the American Society of Mechanical Engineers and two nominated from the Society of Automotive Engineers. They all serve without pay, except that the official members, of course, draw their regular pay, but they receive nothing extra for service on this commission. There is no clerical personnel, not a single clerk or stenographer, so that there is no expense whatever attached to the commission.

Mr. MANN. And they do not make annual reports to Congress which have to be printed at the public expense?

Mr. TILSON. That is correct. I wish also to add that the members of this commission made a trip to England at their own expense, except that possibly some of the officials may have traveled on Government transports by simply paying the cost of subsistence, but there was no other expense attached to the trip. They went to England and to France and there conferred with the standards commissions of those two countries on this matter. There is hope that within the next five years international standards may be adopted in some of these things.

I can assure the gentleman that this commission is unique in this one respect, that it has never cost the Government of the United States a cent, and it is not contemplated that it will cost anything. And yet it is doing a work which the manufacturers of the country and the engineering profession generally agree is one of the most important that is now being done by any commission appointed by Congress.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, that is the stock phrase which we apply to a lot of these matters.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman produce another alongside of it doing more important work?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; when we sent the $20,000,000 worth of grain to Russia. But you extend the life of this commission five years, and you suddenly discover down here in the Bureau of Standards that they have a room or office, with a stenographic force of clerks, that heretofore have been established, and they will be up here asking for an appropriation. And if they get tied up with some international commission, if they get into an international aspect, if we are going to standardize the screw threads of the world, five years will not be long enough to prepare the recommendations.

Mr. TILSON. Again the gentleman is correct. If the international phase of it is entered upon, five years will not be long enough, but by that time the gentleman from Massachusetts, I hope, will see its importance, so that he will be here before the end of the five years asking for an extension of 10 years.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, in order to ward off the danger of any amendment extending the time, I will withdraw my reservation of the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of five years from March 21, 1922.

Resolved, etc., That the term of the National Screw Thread Commission, created by an act approved July 18, 1918, as amended by an act approved March 3, 1919, is hereby extended for a period of five years from March 21, 1922.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE WACCAMAW RIVER, N. C.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9386) to grant the consent of Congress to the Whiteville Lumber Co., Goldsboro, N. C., to construct a bridge across the Waccamaw River at or near Pireway Ferry, county of Columbus, N. C.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9386) to grant the consent of Congress to the Whiteville Lumber Co., Goldsboro, N. C., to construct a bridge across the Waccamaw River at or near Pireway Ferry, county of Columbus, N. C.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Whiteville Lumber Co., Goldsboro, N. C., and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Waccamaw River at a point suitable to the interest of navigation, at or near Pireway Ferry, in the county of Columbus, or adjacent thereto, in the State of North Carolina in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The following committee amendments were read:

In the title, after the word "Company," ending in the second line, eliminate the words "Goldsboro, North Carolina."

Page 1, line 4, after the word "Company," eliminate the words "Goldsboro, North Carolina."

Page 1, line 5, change the word "their" to "its."

Page 1, line 7, change the word "interest" to "interests."

Page 1, line 8, eliminate the comma after the word "Ferry" and eliminate the last word, "or," in the line.

Page 1, line 9, eliminate the words "adjacent thereto, in the," appearing before the word "State."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LYON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXPORTATION OF ARMS OR MUNITIONS OF WAR.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) to amend Senate joint resolution 89, approved March 14, 1912, amending the joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal and other material used in war from any seaport of the United States, approved April 22, 1898.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether he has recently been advised by the State Department that this is expedient legislation? The last information had from Secretary of State Hughes was on March 14 last, and I was wondering whether he has said anything since then as to the desirability of legislation?

Mr. MAPES. A representative from the State Department was before the committee very recently—about 10 days ago, I believe it was—recommending the legislation, and the committee substitute was submitted to the State Department as late as last week, and the department then stated that it desired to have the legislation passed.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the matter except as indicated in the bill itself and the report. The purpose of the bill seems to be to prevent the importation of arms into China and that this is justified because the United States exercises a limited extraterritorial jurisdiction there.

Mr. MAPES. That is correct.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And it is actually in line with the action of other Governments.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman's question is very pertinent, and I assure the gentleman that the matter was taken up with the State Department a very few days ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the joint resolution approved March 14, 1912, amending the joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal and other material used in war from any seaport of the United States, approved April 22, 1898, be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

That whenever the President shall find that in any American country, or in any country in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction, conditions of domestic violence exist, which are promoted by the use of arms and munitions of war procured from the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unalwful to export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

SEC. 2. That any shipment of material hereby declared unlawful after such proclamation shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That whenever the President finds that in any American country, or in any country in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction, conditions of domestic violence exist, which are or may be promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States, and makes proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

"SEC. 2. Whoever exports any arms or munitions of war in violation of section 1 shall, on conviction, be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both.

"SEC. 3. The joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States,' approved April 22, 1898, and the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States,' approved March 14, 1912, are repealed."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read:

Joint resolution to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States to certain countries, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEASE OF CERTAIN LANDS TO CITY OF LEAVENWORTH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9060) to authorize the Secretary of War to lease a certain tract of land to the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to lease to the city of Leavenworth, a municipal corporation in the State of Kansas, the following-described tract of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas:

Beginning at the northwest corner of the 20-acre tract of land formerly in said military reservation granted to the Leavenworth Coal Co. by the act of Congress approved July 20, 1868; thence north in extension of the west line of said 20-acre tract 500 feet; thence east parallel to the north line of said 20-acre tract 820 feet, more or less, to the railroad right of way; thence southerly on the west line of said right of way 503 feet, more or less, to the north line of the said 20-acre tract; thence west on the said north line to the place of beginning, containing 9¼ acres, more or less, reserving to the United States, or assigns, the coal, or royalty for the coal, underlying said lands, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining thereon a reservoir and such other works as may be necessary to enable said company to supply the troops at Fort Leavenworth and its other patrons with pure water: Provided, That the said city shall have the free and uninterrupted use of said tract of land for the purposes above named, under the direction and control of the Secretary of War, so long as it is so used, and that when it ceases to occupy and use it for such purposes the lease shall be null and void.

That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, what is the necessity for this? Is it to take care of a situation arising out of the determination of a franchise of some private corporation taken over by the city?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, the necessity arises from the fact that the private corporation, which at present has this lease, has been sold to the city. The city has acquired all the capital stock of the corporation and owns the existing water plant. It desires to have the lease made direct from the Government to the city instead of permitting it to run to the corporation as it now does.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

STATUE OF DANTE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was Senate joint resolution 99, providing a site upon public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., for the erection of a statue of Dante.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the point of order, has this been on the calendar a sufficient length of time to warrant its consideration?

The SPEAKER. It has not. This ends the calendar for to-day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 33 minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 17, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to inquire what arrangement has been made about a change in the time of voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that no arrangement has been made, and the unanimous-consent agreement will stand as originally entered into.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. In view of the announcement of the Chair, I think I ought to state that I gave notice on yesterday that I would this morning ask for a modification of the unanimous-consent agreement postponing the vote until 4 o'clock and applying the 5-minute rule after 3 o'clock.

Mr. GLASS. May I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that that be done at the conclusion of my speech?

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Alabama brought up the subject and I thought it was incumbent upon me to answer.

Mr. GLASS. If it is not to be discussed, I have no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. I merely wanted to know what arrangement we could make, because I desire to follow the Senator from Virginia in a short speech.

Mr. McLEAN. I intend to bring up the question after the Senator from Virginia concludes his speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. GLASS resumed the speech begun by him on yesterday. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will allow me, it is now about three minutes to the time when the unanimous-consent order will take effect. I think perhaps it might be well, under the circumstances, to agree, if possible, to some extension of the time, and I ask unanimous consent that we extend the time for the beginning of the 5-minute rule to 4 o'clock.

Mr. McLEAN. On yesterday I gave notice that I should ask to-day for a modification of the unanimous-consent agreement. I assume it would be necessary to have a quorum called before the agreement can be changed, and for that reason I suggest the absence of a quorum, for the purpose of asking for a modification of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SMITH. Before the roll is called, may I state that my request for unanimous consent is that the wording shall stand exactly as it is, with the exception of changing the time from 1 o'clock to 4 o'clock for the operation of the 5-minute rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Connecticut submit his proposed change in order that the roll may be called on it.

Mr. McLEAN. I suggest that in line 1 the numeral "2" be changed to "5," and that in line 5 the numeral "1" be changed to "4."

Mr. SMITH. That is correct. I should have suggested that change. I had forgotten the differentiation.

Mr. McLEAN. It is very apparent that this matter ought to be debated further.

Mr. GLASS. What is the proposition?

Mr. SMITH. The unanimous-consent agreement reads as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, January 17, 1922, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The proposition is to change the agreement so that the 5-minute limitation will be deferred until 4 o'clock, and then that we shall begin voting on the bill and all amendments at 5 o'clock.

Mr. GLASS. That is entirely agreeable to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator is presenting the proposal now in accordance with the notice given on yesterday.

Mr. McLEAN. I think that my notice of yesterday called for a vote at 4 o'clock and the application of the 5-minute rule after 3 o'clock. If we can not change that, then we shall have to govern ourselves accordingly, but I would prefer, if we can do it under the rule, to postpone the vote until 5 o'clock. However, if the Chair rules that that can not be done, then we shall have to change the hour of 2 o'clock to 4 o'clock and the hour of 1 o'clock to 3 o'clock, in accordance with my original notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that that is the requirement of the rule.

Mr. McLEAN. Very well. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator does not have to make the suggestion of the absence of a quorum. I presume the Chair will order the roll call on presentation of the notice. But before the Chair orders a quorum call I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

While I think the Chair is right in his construction of the rule, I wish to ask if, after the roll is called and a quorum is ascertained to be present and when the request is officially taken up, it will not then be in order to modify the request the same as we always do in such cases?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Such a request will be in order at that time.

Mr. NORRIS. So it will be in order for the Senator from Connecticut to request a change before we reach a final decision.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish to state that I yielded yesterday afternoon, or rather did not insist on going on, with the understanding, I thought, we were to reach an agreement by which I could follow the Senator from Virginia this morning. I hope the unanimous consent will be granted.

Mr. GLASS. I hope so, too.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia a question.

Mr. SMITH. The hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, and we are limited to five minutes under the unanimous-consent agreement, unless it is changed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Secretary will state the proposed modification of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the unanimous-consent agreement, in accordance with the notice given on yesterday, in line 1 by striking out "2 o'clock" and inserting in lieu "4 o'clock," and in line 5 by striking out "1 o'clock" and inserting in lieu "3 o'clock."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hale	McKinley	Sheppard
Broussard	Harreld	McLean	Shortridge
Bursum	Harris	McNary	Smith
Calder	Heflin	Moses	Smoot
Capper	Johnson	Myers	Sterling
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Swanson
Colt	Jones, Wash.	New	Townsend
Culberson	Kellogg	Norris	Trammell
Cummins	Kenyon	Oddie	Wadsworth
Curtis	Keyes	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	King	Pepper	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	Ladd	Phipps	Watson, Ind.
Fletcher	La Follette	Pittman	Williams
France	Lenroot	Poindexter	Willis
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Pomerene
Glass	McCumber	Ransdell
Gooding	McKellar	Robinson

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. McLEAN. I now ask that in the unanimous-consent agreement the numeral "4," in line 1, be changed to "5," and in line 5 that the numeral "3" be changed to "4."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the request of the Senator from Connecticut that under the rule no such request can be made. Under Rule XII, paragraph 3, it is provided that—

No request by a Senator for unanimous consent for the taking of a final vote on a specified date upon the passage of a bill or joint resolution shall be submitted to the Senate for agreement thereto until, upon a roll call ordered for the purpose by the Presiding Officer, it shall be disclosed that a quorum of the Senate is present.

Then:

And when a unanimous consent is thus given the same shall operate as the order of the Senate, but any unanimous consent may be revoked by another unanimous consent granted in the manner prescribed above upon one day's notice.

In other words, if the Senator wants to modify the unanimous-consent agreement he has to give a day's notice.

Mr. HEFLIN. It was given on yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. But it is just being given now to modify it again, and it can not be acted upon until to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from Utah is in error.

Mr. SMOOT. I will let the Chair decide whether I am in error or not. There is no doubt but that the rule is just as I have read it, and I object to the request of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I believe the ruling the Chair is about to make will be of very great importance, and I should like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that if it be in order now to ask unanimous consent to make a different unanimous-consent agreement than the one proposed in the notice of yesterday hereafter when a unanimous-consent agreement is made and a modification is proposed upon notice, one that everyone would be willing to agree to, then it would be in order, if the Senator from Connecticut is right, the next day to change the consent to a different bill entirely. Thus, under a unanimous-consent agreement for the consideration of a bill Senators, relying upon the notice that it was the intention of the rule to have given, would not be present and could suppose, of course, that they would have notice of a unanimous-consent agreement proposing to take up another and a different bill.

It seems to me very clear that this unanimous-consent agreement can only be modified by one day's notice, treating the newly proposed modification exactly as is the case in a notice for a suspension of the rules. Notice is required under the rules there, but the next day the Senator may not modify his notice by a suspension of a different rule. Exactly the same principle, it seems to me, applies in this case.

Mr. SMOOT. The old rule was that after a unanimous-consent agreement was entered into it could not be changed by unanimous consent, but in a number of cases that worked a hardship, and so the rule was modified as I have read it. As modified, suppose a Senator had been in the Chamber and had no objection to the unanimous-consent notice given on yesterday and felt positive that that was the only thing that could be acted upon or agreed to to-day, and was compelled to leave the city, but if present would object to any further modification, the very object of our rules would be set aside and of no avail. I can not see how the Chair can make any other ruling.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, this is a very important matter, and it will likely take considerable time, so I am going to object to the unanimous-consent request as now presented.

Mr. SMOOT. I have made a point of order against it. I would like to have it settled; but if the Senator objects that ends it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, let me say just a word. We are not postponing the matter to a different day. There is just two hours difference. I want to serve notice on Senators now that if they object to the extension of time so that I can speak there will not be any more unanimous-consent agreements soon——

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

Mr. HEFLIN. Or agreements for executive sessions or anything else.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can not frighten the Senator from Utah by any threat of that kind. All I ask the Senator from Alabama to do is to live up to the rules as the Senator from Utah is perfectly willing to live up to them.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not trying to frighten the Senator from Utah. I am just serving notice.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think objection can be made to considering the notice of yesterday.

Mr. SMITH. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to entering into the unanimous-consent agreement which is proposed?

Mr. LODGE. If I may say just a word, the relaxation of the rule in reference to unanimous-consent agreements by the adoption of the new rule of 1914 was, to my mind, a very dubious experiment, but if we do not adhere to it no unanimous-consent agreement will hereafter be of any value. I think we ought to adhere to the rule; but as to the notice which was given, of course we have a right to consider that.

Mr. SMITH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SMITH. Is the request of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] in accord with the notice which he gave me on yesterday?

Mr. McLEAN. I am about to renew the request, and I understand that there will be no objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the original notice, but it is the modification of the notice which can not be had under the rule.

Mr. McLEAN. I now ask unanimous consent that the modification of the unanimous-consent agreement of which I gave notice on yesterday, and which has been stated by the Secretary, be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the inquiry whether there is any objection to modifying the unanimous-consent agreement in accordance with the proposal of the Senator from Connecticut, in line 1 of the agreement, to change the time of voting from 2 o'clock to 4 o'clock, and in line 5 of the agreement, to change the time when the 5-minute rule shall become operative from 1 o'clock to 3 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. Is what the Chair has stated the original request which was made by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LODGE. That is in accordance with the original notice.

Mr. SMITH. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the unanimous-consent agreement is modified accordingly.

Monday, January 16, 1922.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a while ago said some things with which I am heartily in accord, and I well could express the wish that the discussion of the Federal reserve banking system might generally be engaged in with the same apparent spirit of fairness as was manifested by the Senator from Nebraska.

But, Mr. President, I venture to think that the time has come when some one should assume the task of combating in the Senate the many persistent and constantly recurring misrepresentations which for more than a year have streamed from this Chamber with respect to the Federal reserve banking system and its administration. Aside from a painful disinclination to speak in any circumstances, I had hoped that this service to a great Federal institution, and, indeed, to the country, would be undertaken by some Senator whose long tenure would preclude any thought of a premature anxiety to project himself into the important controversies of this body, and whose established reputation here would arrest the attention of the Senate and command the confidence of the country.

I am not willing to believe that failure of any Senator of this type to speak out in defense of the Federal reserve system may be ascribed to indifference to the success of the system or to any lack of pride in its notable achievements. Many very grave problems have claimed the attention of the Senate and to these Senators have been devoting painstaking labor. Moreover, it may be that Senators generally have thought, as I confessedly have believed, that the hostile assaults on the Federal reserve system and its administration have manifestly been so devoid of the truth and so obviously saturated with ignorant prejudice and injustice as to require no answer.

RESERVE SYSTEM SAVED THE NATION.

But, Mr. President, the misconceptions and misrepresentations to which politicians at Washington have given vehement expression have been eagerly seized upon by restless professional agitators and disseminated from one end to the other of the country. Thus a large body of citizens has been induced to believe that the Federal reserve banking system is a financial juggernaut, crushing the life out of commerce and industry, creating widespread depression, and putting an end to enterprising business activities. Instead of clearly apprehending, that which the facts so amply attest, that this reserve banking system saved their country from inconceivable distress, from irremedial disaster, these people have been taught to believe that its continued existence would be a peril to the Nation. They, in their present mood, literally would smite the hand that feeds them and demolish the instrument of their salvation.

I would not have it imagined, Mr. President, that I purpose to decry fair criticism; on the contrary, it is with me a constant prayer to be kept on guard against the streak of iconoclasm which has too evident a place in my own nature. Neither am I disposed to assert the perfection of any economic instrumentality or the infallibility of any human agency. It would be amazing if the Federal reserve system had no imperfections, and foolish to assert that its administration has been devoid of error. What I do say with all the emphasis of which I am capable is that neither malignant nor ignorant misrepresentation will cure the system's defects or render more efficient its administration.

WHAT IS THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM?

That we may the more surely discover what are the deficiencies of the system, with a view to their abatement, and comprehend to better advantage the mistakes that have occurred in the execution of the law, it might be profitable to inquire what exactly is the Federal reserve banking system and how it has been administered. Having done this, we may determine how true or false are the charges made here, how fair or vicious the criticism. If the system is a curse or its execution a tragedy, I want to be convinced. If the system is a benediction to this Nation and an inspiration to the world, if its administration has been sane and salutary, then I shall feel and express concern for the integrity of this body if it shall appear that Senators have disparaged the character and derided the personal honor of public officials with no better sanction for such behavior than their own peculiar antipathies or their own pitiful ignorance of the financial transactions upon which they have assumed to comment. For one I am not willing that the astonishing statements made here shall any longer go to the country unchallenged and uncontradicted.

For half a century before the advent of the Wilson administration the United States was compelled to endure the handicap of the most unscientific banking and currency system of any that prevailed on the earth. For a part of the time we seem to have been ignorant of our plight; for another part indifferent to the situation, and for the remainder of the time afraid to apply the remedy lest we should wound the sensibilities or interfere with the profits of a privileged class. We were during no protracted stage without ample warning, for the malady manifested itself frequently and violently in disturbances which swept the country like a hurricane from end to end. Five times within 30 years, prior to 1913, a financial catastrophe had overtaken us right in the midst of apparent business prosperity and contentment. Each time the disaster was due largely, if not altogether, to a defective banking and currency system; and it is literally certain that our always tedious restoration was rendered vastly more difficult and painful by the sad lack of well-devised facilities.

SIAMESE TWINS OF DISORDER.

The old system had two fundamental defects. One was an inelastic currency; the other a fictitious bank reserve. They were Siamese twins of disorder; and I am inclined to ascribe the invariable failure of statesmen to reform the financial system of the country to their unwillingness to subdue both of these evils at the same time. While they repeatedly would tackle the problem of an inelastic currency, which everybody wanted solved, they seemed never in a mood to defy the powerful interests behind the national bank reserve system, through the peculiar operation of which nearly the whole sum total of idle bank funds in the United States was congested at a single center for use in the stimulation of speculative enterprises.

A RIGID CURRENCY.

The national currency was inelastic because based on the bonded indebtedness of the United States, rather than upon the sound, liquid business assets of the country. For 50 years we proceeded upon the assumption that the country always needed a volume of currency equal to its bonded indebtedness, and never at any time required less, whereas we frequently did not need near as much as was outstanding and just as often could have absorbed vastly more than was available. Hence, when it happened that the circulating medium was redundant, when its volume was too great to be used in local commercial transactions, instead of taking it through the expensive process of retirement it was bundled off to the great reserve centers at a nominal interest rate, to be thrown, at call, into the vortex of stock speculation.

In a different way and to an immeasurably greater extent the business of the country was made to suffer by this rigid currency system in times of stirring development and enterprising activity. It could not begin to meet the commercial and industrial requirements of the country. For example, the total capitalization of the national banks of a given community in time of stress, under the old system, measured the full capacity of those banks to respond to the currency requirements of the locality. If the combined capital stock of the national banks of a city was $5,000,000, that exactly circumscribed the ability of those banks to supply currency of their own issue to meet the demands of business, albeit these might necessitate the use of $10,000,000 or more. And in time of panic, such as that which convulsed the country in 1907, had these banks held $5,000,000 of gilt-edge short-time commercial paper in their vaults they could not, under the old system, have exchanged a dollar of it for currency wherewith to make up the deficiency and promptly respond to the requirements of business; for practically all the banks were in the same desperate plight, every one, with rare exceptions, looking out for itself, with no other source of supply.

A NOTABLE ACHIEVEMENT.

What was done by the Sixty-third Congress was to revolutionize this wretched currency system, the unhappy victims of which are without number and the losses beyond human approximation. We substituted for a rigid bond-secured circulating medium, unresponsive at any time to the commercial requirements of this great Nation, a perfectly elastic currency, based on the sound, liquid commercial assets of the country, responsive at all times and to the fullest extent to every reasonable demand of legitimate enterprise. It comes forth when required and is canceled when not needed. The amount is ample when business is active and only enough when business is lax. So that in a case similar to the one cited a while ago, where the banks of a given community, with $5,000,000 of liquid commercial assets, could not, under the old system, in time of stress get a dollar of currency on their holdings, because there was no source of supply, the same banks, under the Federal reserve system, could exchange their $5,000,000 of liquid assets at a Federal reserve bank for $5,000,000 of the best currency on earth, less a fair rate of discount. That one reform represents the difference between disaster and success.

A VICIOUS RESERVE SYSTEM.

Another fundamental defect of the old system was its fictitious bank reserve, created by that provision of the national-bank act which authorized a deposit or book credit of individual country banks with banks in reserve and central reserve cities to be counted as reserve, just as if held in the vaults of the interior banks. On these reserve balances, subjected to a process of multiplication, the big banks of the money centers would pay nominal interest, which operated as a magnet to attract the reserve funds of the entire country; so that on March 14, 1914, eight months before the Federal reserve system was put in actual operation, the New York banks alone held $836,000,000 of the funds of outside banks, while they were loaning outside banks only $192,000,000. Already the congressional monetary inquiry had disclosed the startling fact that on November 24, 1912, the legal custodians of these reserve funds had put $240,000,000 of them in the maelstrom of Wall Street stock operations. Do you realize quite what that means? It means that these millions and many millions more were withdrawn from the reach of agricultural, mercantile, and industrial uses throughout the United States at a fair rate of interest and loaned to stock gamblers at an abnormally low rate of interest in comparison.

We talk about the law of supply and demand and pass laws to punish combinations in restraint of trade; but before the enactment of the Federal reserve act the banking community, under the sanction of the atrocious system of an inelastic currency and a fictitious reserve, was enabled to defy the law of supply and demand both in the lax season and in the tense. For in the season of lax trade and abundant currency local bankers feared to relax the standard rate of interest. Instead of keeping the money at home and giving the local agricultural, commercial, and industrial interests the advantage to be derived from low rates of discount, the surplus funds were sent to the money centers for the accommodation of speculators.

A PANIC BREEDER.

The old system was a rank panic breeder. In periods of greatest business activity the country was made to suffer desperately for lack of adequate credit facilities. When the prospect was brightest; when men of ambition and energy would press forward in pursuit of prosperity and the hum of industry would literally be heard throughout the land, two links in the chain would suddenly snap, tearing to shreds the whole business fabric and carrying dismay to every community on the continent. In plain terms, when the country banks of the United States, trying to respond to the commercial and industrial demands upon them in their respective localities, being unable to issue additional currency, would seek to draw in their reserve balances from the congested centers, and when the big banks of these centers would, in turn, be compelled to call their loans on stock, thus contracting the credit facilities of "the street," interest rates would quickly jump, mounting higher and higher, until panic would ensue, banks throughout the country would stop payments across the counter and consternation would reign where confidence and contentment so soon before had prevailed. I have said the losses are beyond computation; and that is so. They affected not alone the financial institutions immediately involved, but the merchants whose credits were suspended; the industries whose shops were closed; the railroads whose cars were made idle; the farmers whose crops rotted in the fields; the laborer who was deprived of his wage. No business enterprise, if any individual, ever entirely escaped.

ANOTHER GREAT ACHIEVEMENT.

It was another great achievement of the Sixty-third Congress to remedy this monstrous condition. No other legislative effort, as I recall the history of events, was ever directed against this bank-reserve evil. It required courage. It constituted a challenge to the dominating financial interests of America, and they accepted the invitation to the conflict. It was a memorable fight, in which sound economic principles triumphed so completely that many of the great bankers who seemed once implacable now concede that a tremendous advance has been made in the direction of scientific banking, and there is a general concurrence of belief that the Federal-reserve system saved this country from financial convulsion when the World War raged and after it ended.

We corrected this vicious bank-reserve system by establishing regional reserve banks and making them, instead of private banks in the money centers, the custodians of the reserve funds of the United States; by making these regional banks, instead of private correspondent banks, the great rediscount agencies of the country; by requiring these regional banks to minister to commerce and industry rather than to the schemes of speculative adventure. Under the old system the country banks were subservient to the money centers, for only there could they resort for rediscount favors. Under the new system it is no longer a question of favor; it is purely a question of business.

AN INSPIRING CONTRAST.

In 1907 New York could not let a country bank have $50,000 of bank currency to meet the ordinary requirements of commerce or the pay rolls of industry. In the fateful year 1915 New York let two European nations at war have $500,000,000. The new system enabled the Government to lend $10,000,000,000 abroad and to float $24,000,000,000 at home for war purposes. Under the old system about $60,000,000 measured the volume of rediscounts; under this reserve system one of the smaller regional banks exceeds that amount in a single State.

RURAL CREDITS.

Not in 50 years had any party written a provision into the national bank act for as much as one dollar of rural credits. On the contrary, by the text of the law, by the rulings of the Treasury, and by decisions of the courts, every semblance of farm credits was sedulously excluded. The Federal reserve system furnishes millions of dollars of farm-credit facilities. Not a dollar of the funds of a national bank could be loaned under the old system on improved farm lands. Under the Federal reserve act, according to a computation by the late Charles A. Conant, $359,000,000 are made available for loans on farm mortgages alone having five years to run. In the matter of current rediscounts every rational advantage is given to farm credits over mercantile paper, and I shall show that billions of dollars have been loaned to the farmers of the United States. In the matter of acceptances on the exportation of the great staple products of the farm infinite aid is extended to the American farmers. In addition to this the Federal reserve system has had a powerful influence in lowering the rate of interest, and in this circumstance alone the farmers of the country have been saved millions of dollars. Yet it is at a system which has done this unprecedented service to American agriculture that professional "friends" of the farmer are hacking away. It is to a system which has put hope in rural life that caressing demagogues, for selfish purposes, falsely ascribe the inevitable reaction from the saturnalia of unparalleled expenditures.

What are these regional banks?

There is no mystery about them. It is not difficult to understand their organization or their processes. Each of them has a defined territory. They are operated by boards of directors, just as any individual bank is. They are conducted with the same banking instinct, with the same technique, with the same mechanical and human appliances. They are owned not by the Government of the United States, as one would suppose, but by their stockholding member banks. The Government of the United States never contributed a dollar to their capital; the taxpayers are not assessed a penny for their maintenance; they pay the Government annually an enormous sum in franchise fees—$60,000,000 per annum—against the meager sum of $3,000,000 per year paid by all the national banks in the United States put together. They are banks of banks. They do not loan, can not loan, a dollar to any individual in the United States nor to any concern or corporation in the United States, but only to stockholding banks.

A member bank in Utah, for example, has accommodated its customers to the full extent of its resources. It can loan no more without violation of the National or State banking acts. It needs additional funds with which to make other loans. How does it obtain them? By taking the note of a borrower, with its collateral security, giving it the indorsement of that individual bank. It sends the note thus indorsed to the reserve bank at Kansas City, the reserve bank rediscounts the note at an inappreciable charge over the rate of interest which the member bank charged its customers. That supplies the member bank with additional funds to loan to other borrowers. It is very simple. There should not be so much ignorance about it here.

THE SUPERVISORY POWER.

At the head of these 12 regional reserve banks we put a supervising board. It is not a central bank. It can not loan a penny to anybody, or to any concern, or to any corporation. It does not engage in the minutiæ of banking over the counter. It has not a dollar, and never had a dollar, to loan to anybody. It is a supervisory board. It has nothing to do with, and not necessarily any knowledge of, the detailed discount operations of the various regional reserve banks. It can not command the weakest or the strongest regional reserve bank in the district to discount to the extent of one dollar if that bank does not care to do so. It can not prohibit a single regional reserve bank from discounting millions of dollars if it has the eligible paper and wants to do it.

Mr. POMERENE. Will not the Senator go a little further and say it has not done it in the past?

Mr. GLASS. It has not done it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned, will the Senator explain the origin of this heresy which some Senators and a good many of the people have, that the Federal reserve districts can draw upon New York whenever they please; that it is the duty of the New York bank to loan to the people of Utah, to the people of California, to the people of Alabama the money which belongs to the Federal reserve bank there, and that it is the duty of the Federal reserve banks in the various districts to loan whenever any person comes and desires money, even though the bank does not have sufficient capital to justify the continuation of the enormous loans which it in the past has made?

Mr. GLASS. The Senator has so stated his inquiry as that it carries its own answer. No banking system that would do those things could survive in any country on earth.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will allow me, perhaps I misunderstood the inquiry which the Senator from Utah made when he said that the reserve bank of one district could not be drawn upon for the benefit of another reserve bank. Was that what the Senator said?

Mr. KING. I did not put it that way. Of course, I appreciate that in a certain contingency, as has been explained by the Senator from Virginia, there may be a crisis which may warrant interregional discounts; but the heresy has grown up that the people of Utah, or the people of Alabama, or the people of any other district can demand of New York, or of some other district, that it respond to the wishes and needs of any State or any district.

Mr. GLASS. I will ask that Senators desist for the present from this argument. I do not object to being interrupted, but I do want to finish this speech.

Mr. SMITH. I just want to read in that connection one little paragraph of about 5 lines from the law.

Mr. GLASS. I shall come to that, if the Senator will allow me. I shall explain it fully. I have said that in certain extreme contingencies the law does permit the Federal Reserve Board, by a vote of five of the seven members, to go to the financial assistance of some weak Federal reserve bank to avoid a crisis, not in ordinary course to loan it the funds of some other region with which to do business. The textual restriction of the statute on the Federal Reserve Board indicates what was contemplated. If, perchance, the inability of a weak Federal reserve bank to respond to the urgent requirements of its member banks would threaten financial disaster in a great section of the country, then, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board, five members of which were required to act affirmatively, one Federal reserve bank might go to the assistance of another Federal reserve bank. That is all there is to that. The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who was a conferee with me on the bill, knows I am stating the case exactly.

Mr. President, if my exposition of the Federal reserve act has been accurate, it will be observed that the Federal Reserve Board sitting at Washington is not a central bank; it is merely a supervisory body, with certain clearly defined, limited powers. It can not establish a credit for any individual member bank at a single one of the Federal reserve banks. It can not issue a dollar of currency to any one of these regional banks, except upon the specific application of the regional bank. It can not withdraw or cancel one dollar of Federal reserve bank notes, with a view to contracting the currency or for any other purpose, not a dollar.

I have sat here for a year and heard Senators denouncing the Federal Reserve Board for withdrawing circulating notes. It has no particle of authority under the law to withdraw one single dollar of currency from circulation.

It may decline to issue currency upon request of a regional reserve bank, but there is not one instance of record since the establishment of the system in which it has done that. It may levy a tax on Federal reserve notes, so as to make their issuance uninviting to the regional banks, but there is no instance of record in which it has levied a penny of tax on note issues.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I saw in the Washington papers yesterday a statement issued by the Federal Reserve Board which seemed to say that during the last 12 months they had retired of their note circulation a thousand million dollars.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that the Federal Reserve Board has not retired a dollar. The various regional reserve banks have retired their Federal reserve notes, for which they made application when business was humming and industry was at its height. Now that there is widespread business depression, these regional reserve banks, not the Federal Reserve Board, have sent in certain notes for cancellation and destruction.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator, before he leaves that question, who fixes the discount rate?

Mr. GLASS. The Federal reserve banks fix the rate, subject to review and determination by the Federal Reserve Board. I am coming to that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. GLASS. I do. I want to give all the information I can, but Senators by interrupting are going to prolong my speech.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not understand that the Federal Reserve Board, as such, has the power to restrict the issuance of notes or enlarge the amount of an issue; but inasmuch as one-third of the board of directors of each of the regional banks is appointed by the Federal Reserve Board in Washington, does not the Senator believe that any recommendation of policy directed to these regional banks would be quite effective, and is it not claimed that such policies have been announced by the Federal Reserve Board, and that that has resulted in the deflation of the currency in the country and in the restriction of the amount of the currency; and does not that in effect operate in the same way that it would if the board had the direct power to make the restriction?

Mr. GLASS. I say to the Senator from New Mexico that every director of a Federal reserve bank must be a resident of his Federal reserve district. The appointment of three of these directors by the Federal Reserve Board, as the Senator from Ohio will recall, was resisted by the banking community of the United States. They were put there to represent the interests of the Government, because the Government, under the operations of the banks, would be one of the largest depositors in the banks. I have no doubt the banking community to-day would gladly welcome an alteration to exclude these three appointed members from the regional boards.

Answering the other part of the Senator's inquiry, I will say that the Federal Reserve Board has never, since it was inaugurated, offered a suggestion to a Federal reserve bank that it should or should not make rediscounts or apply for currency.

Mr. FLETCHER. If I may interrupt the Senator just on that point, is it not true that the power to fix the rate of rediscount is the power to control circulation?

Mr. GLASS. I said to another Senator that I would reach that presently. If Senators will just let me get on, I hope I shall not leave any phase of the problem untouched.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not know that the same question had been presented. It seems to me they do not need the power to control circulation as long as they have the power to control the rate of rediscount.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, the power to fix the rate of rediscount is a fundamental banking power of the system.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am sorry to interrupt the Senator, but I saw the statement made by people who were supposed to know and be advised about it, that the Federal Reserve Board in Washington had made a direct request of the regional banks in certain sections of the country, as well as member banks, that no more loans of a certain character should be made; for instance, upon live stock. Personally, I was never able to find out from any authoritative source that such a thing had been done, and I should like to know whether or not the Senator has any information upon that subject.

Mr. GLASS. I know it is not true, I will say to the Senator from New Mexico. The Federal Reserve Board at one time did what Senator after Senator upon this floor did. In one of its public outgivings it suggested that there ought to be a cessation of extravagance in this country; that the credits of the country should be devoted to taking care of the necessities of the people rather than the luxuries of the people. Will anybody question the Solomonic wisdom of a declaration of that sort? The board has never at any time indicated to a bank that it should not engage in lawful and proper rediscount activities, and has never denied the application of a regional bank for one dollar of Federal currency.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator has already referred to the fact that only one-third of the directors of the regional banks are appointed by the Federal Reserve Board. The other two-thirds are divided into two classes, one representing the smaller banks and the other representing the larger banks. The thought struck me that ordinarily two-thirds can control one-third.

Mr. GLASS. There has never been any suggestion that the one-third were in any degree out of sympathy with the agricultural, commercial, or industrial requirements of their particular region. It is not natural to suppose they ever are. They are business men of character and reputation, identified with the particular region. Why should they wish it harm?

These powers, with the right to review and determine rediscount rates, are conferred by the law on the Federal Reserve Board for the security of the banking system of the United States and to insure that any expansion of the currency shall be upon safe and sane lines.

RECKLESS CHARGE OF DEFLATION.

Yet, Mr. President, with these restricted powers unexercised to this day, the Federal Reserve Board, times without number, has recklessly been charged with instituting and executing "drastic and cruel policies of deflation." One perfervid Senator characterized it a "murderous" policy of discrimination against agricultural produce. What, precisely, is meant by this charge? It can signify but one thing, which is, in plain terms, that the Federal Reserve Board at Washington, without sanction of law, ordered Federal reserve banks, especially those located in the agricultural regions, to curtail or stop rediscounts or that the board refused to issue currency upon application of the banks or that the board did both these things. The actual truth is, Mr. President, the Federal Reserve Board did neither of these things, and I challenge the production here or elsewhere of any particle of evidence of any such action by the Federal Reserve Board. It issued no such order; it had no right to issue any such order. And, as I have pointed out, while the board is vested by law with explicit authority to refuse to issue currency or to tax that outstanding in order to influence its redemption, the board has not exercised its lawful power in either respect. Every dollar of bank credit denied was withheld by a local bank or regional bank. The Federal Reserve Board had nothing to do with it. Every dollar of currency retired was retired by a local bank or regional bank. The board had nothing to do with it.

By whom, then, Mr. President, was this wicked policy of deflation of the credits and currency of the system instituted and what were the agencies employed in its execution? Each regional bank of the system is master in its own domain, subject only to the Federal statutes; it is operated by men, all citizens of its territory. Two-thirds of its directors are selected by the member banks in its territory. These men are presumed to understand the conditions and to know the requirements of every interest in the territory—agricultural, commercial, or industrial. If there was deflation, "wicked" or righteous, monstrous or sane, the directors of these respective Federal reserve banks, in larger degree than any other agency under the law, should be held responsible for it.

But I pointedly deny that there was deflation of either regional reserve bank credits or any diminution of Federal reserve currency for the period of the appalling drop in prices of agricultural products.

INCONTROVERTIBLE FACTS AND FIGURES.

I hope Senators will take particular note of that declaration and convict me here, if they can, of any inaccuracy that appertains to it. Rhetoric, whether the motive of it be harmless or vile, is one thing. A cold, indisputable fact is something different. In all this fanfare of prejudice and vituperation there has not been given one authenticated fact or figure to justify the assertion that the Federal reserve banking system was appreciably delinquent or in any degree oppressive. I shall present proof to the Senate that, in the period of precipitated prices of farm products, there was a constant expansion of regional bank credits and an increase in the volume of Federal reserve notes issued. At this point I shall insert in the RECORD figures furnished me by the Bureau of Statistics, Department of Agriculture, giving the average seasonal price, by the month, of cotton, wheat, corn, and oats from July, 1919, to January, 1921, inclusive:

	Cotton.	Wheat.	Corn.	Oats.
1919.
July	$0.311	$2.22	$1.76	$0.71
August	.325	2.17	1.91	.75
September	.303	2.06	1.85	.72
October	.313	2.10	1.54	.68
November	.365	2.13	1.33	69
December	.357	2.15	1.35	72
1920.
January	.359	2.32	1.40	.78
July	.374	2.54	1.86	1.04
August	.368	2.32	1.64	.82
September	.311	2.19	1.56	.70
October	.255	2.14	1.21	.61
November	.194	1.88	.87	.54
December	.14	1.44	.68	47
1921.
January	.115	1.49	.67	46

Mr. President, an examination of these figures discloses the fact that cotton, quoted at 31.1 cents in July, 1919, is quoted at 37.4 cents in July, 1920, when a sharp decline set in, until for January, 1921, cotton was quoted at 11.5 cents, a decline of 69.3 per cent from July, 1920, to January, 1921.

It is seen that oats rose from 71 cents for July, 1919, to $1.04 for July, 1920, and dropped to 46 cents for January, 1921, a decline of 55.8 per cent from July, 1920, to January, 1921.

It will be noted that wheat rose gradually from $2.22 for July, 1919, to $2.54 for July, 1920, and fell to $1.49 for January, 1921, a decline of 41.4 per cent from July, 1920, to January, 1921.

It will be observed that corn fluctuated from $1.76 for July, 1919, to $1.86 for July, 1920, and fell to 67 cents for January, 1921, a decline of 63.9 per cent from July, 1920, to January, 1921.

This shocking decline in the produce of American farmers, as well as a less acute decline in the products of our mills, is a familiar story to every intelligent business man of the country. If it can be established that for this period from January 1, 1920, to January 1, 1921, the Federal reserve banks, severally or in the aggregate, contracted their credits and diminished the volume of their note issues, those who charge them with "a drastic and cruel policy of deflation" may justify the accusation with respect to these regional banks. But even in this event they can get no sanction for their assaults upon the Federal Reserve Board, which does not initiate bank credits nor issue currency except upon application of the regional banks. Now, let us see what the facts are. At this point I shall place in the RECORD an authenticated statement of paper held under discount for member banks of the Federal reserve system as of January 1, 1920, and January 1, 1921; likewise a statement of the volume of Federal reserve notes in circulation on January 1, 1920, and on January 1, 1921.

Paper held under rediscount for member banks in each Federal reserve district, also Federal reserve notes in circulation on Jan. 1, 1920 and 1921.

[000 omitted.]

Total	2,215,305	2,687,393	3,008,878	3,336,281

CREDITS INCREASE AS PRICES DROP.

An analysis of these statistics shows that the total amount of rediscounted paper held by the 12 regional reserve banks on January 1, 1920, was $2,215,305,000. Instead of deflating their credits, as has been charged, these banks as of January 1, 1921, had increased their accommodations to member banks in the aggregate to $2,687,393,000, an expansion of $472,088,000 in the 12-month period.

If any Senator can controvert this fact, I pause to have him do it.

On January 1, 1920, the 12 regional reserve banks had notes in circulation to the amount of $3,008,878,000. Instead of reducing circulation, these same banks on January 1, 1921, had outstanding circulation aggregating $3,336,281,000, a total expansion of currency of $328,403,000 for the 12-month period of falling prices.

Will any Senator say that that is not true?

Thus it will be noted that so far from the truth is the accusation that the Federal Reserve Board "tumbled" the prices of farm products by a cruel policy of deflation, it is shown that during the whole period of falling prices the Federal reserve banks were supplying largely increased credit facilities and issuing a constantly increasing volume of Federal reserve notes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not want the Senator to get the impression that I agree to a good many of those things.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, I do not get the impression that the Senator from Alabama agrees with a single one of those things.

Mr. HEFLIN. Because I expect to reply to the Senator, and I want him to know that I disagree with him on several of these propositions.

Mr. GLASS. I would have assumed that without any statement from the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator compliments my friendship for the people of the country.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, Mr. President, no friendship can intervene where a great and vital interest of the country is concerned. I believe it was the Duke of Guise who once was bitterly reprimanded by the Archbishop of Paris for exhibiting some degree of acerbity toward a friend. The prelate asked how he could reconcile his attitude with his professions as a churchman, and the Duke of Guise responded, "I confess, your grace, that Christ taught us to forgive our enemies; but I think you will search Scripture in vain to find that he anywhere admonished us to forgive our friends." That is my reply to the Senator from Alabama when he appeals to friendship to avert criticism of his misrepresentation of the Federal Reserve Board here in Washington.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Virginia misunderstood me. I said that he was complimenting my friendship for the people of the country and my desire to have a fair deal for them, and not my friendship for the Senator, which is great; we are personal friends; but I am not appealing to that. I will take care of the Senator's arguments along that line.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, I do not doubt that.

It is significant, Mr. President—and I call the attention of my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the fact—that these increased facilities were applied for and granted at the increased rate of rediscount put into effect by the regional reserve banks and approved by the Federal Reserve Board. This tremendous expansion of Federal reserve credits, aggregating nearly $1,000,000,000 within the 12-month period of falling prices, was not managed except by an alarming encroachment upon the gold reserves of the regional banks, one of them, as I recall, barely escaping the humiliating if not disastrous experience of having its gold reserve wiped out of existence; it had to resort to the expedient of largely rediscounting with another Federal reserve bank at the North.

LOANS TO FARMERS.

Let me anticipate here a thought which may have place in the minds of some Senators. Doubtless they will want to know in what sections of the country these extensions of credit prevailed, in order to determine whether one class of citizens was discriminated against or another class granted peculiar privileges by the Federal reserve banks. We shall see:

The regional bank at Richmond accommodates the grain, fruit, tobacco, and cotton portions of the fifth district. Were its credits deflated or its note issues reduced during the period of falling prices? Not at all; both credits and circulation were extended. On January 1, 1920, the Richmond Federal Reserve Bank held discounted paper to the amount of $114,772,000. On January 1, 1921, its rediscounts had been increased to $125,473,000, or more than $10,000,000. On January 1, 1920, the Richmond bank's note issue amounted to $145,765,000; on January 1, 1921, the bank's note issue had been increased to $155,169,000, an expansion of nearly $10,000,000, the total expansion in currency and credits being about $20,000,000 in the period of falling prices.

The Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank, which is in the cotton belt, as the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] may note, held $88,052,000 of discount paper on January 1, 1920. Was there any deflation at the Atlanta bank? Not a bit; on January 1, 1921, its rediscounts had about doubled, amounting to $166,640,000. Its note issues increased from $155,511,000 on January 1, 1920, to $173,406,000 on January 1, 1921, a total increase in credits granted of $96,483,000 within the period of falling prices.

The Chicago Federal Reserve Bank, accommodating the grain and live-stock section of the country, on January 1, 1920, had a volume of $267,639,000 in rediscounts, and during the period of falling prices these credits had increased to $475,563,000 on January 1, 1921. Its note issues for the same period increased from $500,139,000 to $545,395,000; total expansion, $253,178.

The St. Louis Federal Reserve Bank, accommodating the grain and live-stock territory, on January 1, 1920, held rediscounts aggregating $77,679,000. These credits increased during the period of falling prices to $114,933,000. Its note issues were reduced by the sum of $10,000,000; aggregate expansion of the bank's credit about $37,000,000.

The Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank, in the grain and stock section, had $110,380,000 rediscounts on January 1, 1920. These credits had expanded to $139,402,000 on January 1, 1921, and its Federal reserve note issue had increased in the same period $7,500,000; total expansion, $36,522,000.

The Federal reserve bank at Dallas held $28,371,000 in discounted paper on January 1, 1920, which amount had been more than trebled on January 1, 1921, totaling $97,392,000. For the same period its note issue increased about $5,000,000, aggregating $79,453,000; total expansion, $74,021,000.

The San Francisco Federal Reserve Bank, accommodating the fruit, dairy, and other farm industries of the Pacific States, held $73,896,000 of eligible paper on January 1, 1920. This amount had more than doubled on January 1, 1921, when it reached $167,598,000. This bank's note issue increased from $242,462,000 to $272,463,000, an increase of more than $93,000,000 in credits and $30,000,000 in the volume of its notes.

Mr. President, while this expansion of credits was taking place in the agricultural districts of the United States, the notable fact is disclosed by the official figures that there were scarcely any increases by the banks located in the great industrial centers of the country. Senators may easily examine the table and ascertain for themselves the accuracy of this statement.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it not true also that during this decline of prices there was an advance by the Federal reserve banks in the industrial districts to the banks in the other sections of about $267,000,000?

Mr. GLASS. The Federal reserve bank of Cleveland, in the Senator's own State, advanced, as I recall—and I will insert in the RECORD the exact figures—$150,000,000, and perhaps in excess of that, to the Federal reserve banks in the agricultural regions of the country. It did not have to be compelled to do so by the Federal Reserve Board, but took the action on its own initiative, or perhaps at the suggestion of the Federal Reserve Board.

AMAZING LIBERALITY OF RESERVE BANKS.

I shall anticipate another thought which doubtless arises in the minds of Senators who may desire to know whether strictly agricultural credits, as distinguished from mercantile and industrial credits, were diminished during the period of falling prices. The figures show that loans on agricultural and live-stock paper increased enormously within the period of price precipitation. At this point I will insert in the RECORD a table giving the loans on agricultural and live-stock paper, as segregated, each month for the entire year of 1920, showing that these loans by the banks in the agricultural sections increased more than fivefold, while prices for agricultural products were falling in a distressing degree:

Loans of Federal reserve banks on agricultural and live-stock paper for 1920.

January	$56,905,000
February	67,195,000
March	74,665,000
April	106,382,000
May	140,691,000
June	168,038,000
July	202,520,000
August	216,278,000
September	224,424,000
October	240,649,000
November	241,561,000
December	246,940,000

The figures in some detail show that at the Richmond Federal Reserve Bank loans on this kind of paper increased from $449,000 on January 1, 1920, to $9,251,000 on January 1, 1921.

The loans of the Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank on paper of this character increased from $841,000 on January 1, 1920, to $16,831,000 on January 1, 1921.

Why, Mr. President, I am amazed at the broad liberality of this regional reserve banking system in that distressing time. Had I any criticism to make of its administration it would be that it too far transgressed the requirements of safe banking.

The Federal reserve bank at Dallas on January 31, 1920, had only $4,450,000 on agricultural and live-stock paper, which was increased to $31,251,000 by January 1, 1921.

The Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank increased its loans on this kind of paper from $20,022,000 on January 31, 1920, to $46,840,000 on January 1, 1921, during the period of falling prices.

The Federal reserve bank at St. Louis on January 31, 1920, held but $294,000 of agricultural and live-stock paper, which amount by January 1, 1921, had been increased to $4,896,000 during the period of falling prices.

The Federal reserve bank at Minneapolis held on January 31, 1920, only $6,855,000 of agricultural and live-stock paper. On January 1, 1921, it held $53,896,000 of strictly agricultural paper.

The Chicago Federal Reserve Bank on January 1, 1920, was loaning but $12,783,000 on agricultural and live-stock paper, whereas on January 1, 1921, it had increased these loans to $52,695,000 during the period of falling prices.

I would call the attention of the Senate to this significant fact in this connection:

These figures constitute loans made to the agricultural interests of the country on paper having a maturity of six months, which paper may easily be segregated; but the figures are not an index to the full volume of agricultural loans, because hundreds of millions of dollars of commercial loans are made to the farmers of the country on paper of 90 days' maturity. Indeed, by reference to page 17 of the last annual report of the Federal Reserve Board it will be seen that 11 of the Federal reserve banks, excluding the New York bank altogether, made loans for farm and dairy purposes for the year 1920, comprising the period of falling prices for farm products, aggregating $1,980,063,000 as against $729,266,000 for a like period of 1919; and this great volume of credit does not include the large amounts advanced on cotton, wool, and similar lines by the greater banks of the system.

THE SYSTEM NOT SECTIONAL.

Mr. President, I am not speaking for any section of the country or against any section of the country. I am not speaking for the Democratic Party or for the Republican Party. I despise the conception of the man who thinks that we should harass and corrupt this great Federal banking institution by introducing politics into its administration or political henchmen into its personnel. Once that is done, the system is gone beyond reclamation. I am speaking for the integrity of this great Federal reserve banking system, which saved every section of the country in a time of unprecedented disturbance, when all the world beside was going into financial chaos and being wrecked almost beyond recovery. But it is a fact of some significance that the Federal reserve banks of the North, without compulsion of any kind, went largely to the assistance of the agricultural interests of the South and West. At one time, in October, 1920, in the crop-moving period of that year, when the prices of agricultural products were going down, the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland alone was loaning to the reserve banks in the West and South no less than $145,800,000.

Mark this: The loans of the Federal reserve bank at Cleveland in the South and West exceeded its total loans to member banks of its own district, including the banks of the great cities of Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and Cincinnati, the greatest industrial district of the United States.

These funds were derived from the stockholding banks of that district; they represented the vision, the enterprise, the activities of the men and industries of that territory. Yet, in an effort to save a distressing situation they were loaned to the banks in the agricultural regions of the United States. And so also did the Federal reserve banks at Boston and Philadelphia and New York, by permission of the Federal Reserve Board, loan from their funds to western and southern Federal reserve banks for the relief of the agricultural situation in those sections. Indeed, the Dallas Federal Reserve Bank borrowed continuously from the northern reserve banks from the spring of 1920 to December 15, 1921. Minneapolis just finished paying out of debt to these banks last November, and Richmond and Atlanta last December. Happily, all of the Federal reserve banks are now above their reserve requirements, each standing on its own resources, with the ability and the willingness to take care of all reasonable credit requirements. It was the palpable intent of the law that they should do this. It was never intended that interregional discounts should be a normal process of this system.

NOT A CENTRAL BANK.

Some Senators seem to imagine that we have a central banking system in this country. The amazing statement is made here that Congress in 1913 adopted a slightly modified form of the Aldrich bill, which did provide a central banking institution. No greater misconception was ever projected in this Senate Chamber, and no man on earth knew better than Mr. Aldrich himself that a statement of this kind involves a total misunderstanding either of the provisions of the Aldrich bill or the essential provisions of the Federal reserve statute. We have no central bank, and the Federal Reserve Board sitting at Washington has no right, except in circumstances threatening the financial fabric of the Nation, to even order one Federal reserve bank to rediscount the discounted paper of another regional bank. Even in a financial crisis, such as the law contemplates, it requires the affirmative action of at least five of the seven members of the Federal Reserve Board to compel one of these regional reserve banks to rediscount for the other. Hence, when gentlemen talk about the great resources and earn- ing assets of this or that Federal reserve bank and imagine that these resources are available as a normal process for use in other regions, they simply display a lamentable ignorance of the Federal reserve banking system, both as to the text and intent of the law. When the junior Senator from Alabama assumes that the contemplated expenditure of a certain sum of money for a regional reserve bank building in New York operates to restrict the banking credits of cotton planters in the South, he is talking pitiful nonsense. What have agricultural credits in the South to do, directly or indirectly, with a bank building in New York or Chicago or Cleveland or San Francisco? It might as well be said that the school children of Birmingham or Richmond have their educational facilities wickedly impaired because the school board at New York or Boston has been or contemplates spending more money for educational purposes next year than all the Southern States combined. That sort of talk is not even specious; it is such arrant nonsense that I should not like to believe it can deceive the very simplest among those who are the accustomed victims of demagogy!

THE CASE CLEARLY PROVED.

Presently, Mr. President, I shall briefly discuss the question of bank building and bank salaries. For the moment I desire sharply to draw the attention of the Senate and the country to the incontestable fact that the authentic figures which I have presented prove beyond controversy that the crashing decline in the prices of farm products was not caused by the Federal Reserve Board at Washington nor by any policy adopted or pursued by the Federal reserve banks throughout the country.

These figures prove beyond all controversy that, instead of deflating credits and currency, the Federal reserve banks, during the period of falling prices, enormously expanded bank credits and increased the volume of circulating notes. This is especially true with respect to credits in the agricultural sections of the United States, for it appears from the official figures that while agricultural credits were expanding commercial credits were contracting. Federal reserve banks in the great money centers carrying an aggregate of $467,000,000 in bankers' acceptances this last summer were carrying less than $40,000,000 of these acceptances.

The figures show a decline in commercial credits secured by Government securities of nearly $1,000,000,000 in that period. What, then, becomes of this charge of "cruel and wicked and murderous" deflation of farm credits by the Federal reserve banks under orders from the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. President, any self-respecting board of directors of any one of these Federal reserve banks would doubtless resent an order from the Federal Reserve Board to abandon its rediscounting operations. The board has no lawful authority to issue any such order. These rediscounts frequently take place without the immediate knowledge or consent of the Federal Reserve Board. It is only when currency is desired, when application is made for the issuance of Federal reserve notes, or when a regional bank depletes its gold reserve, that the intimate knowledge and supervisory power of the Federal Reserve Board is brought into effect.

What, then, becomes of the charge of "murderous deflation" when it is examined? It takes its place in the limbo of discarded fiction. For my part, I fervently thank God that I have no responsibility for its inception or its propagation or the dissemination of its vile odors. No one will ever be able to compute the amount of damage done by this misrepresentation and the harmful use made of it by erupting politicians. The truth in one sentence is that falling prices caused the deflation of credits and currency, such as we have witnessed since January of last year, and not deflation of credits the fall in prices.

WHY PRICES TUMBLED.

Mr. President, the crash in commodity prices in the summer and fall of 1920 is not a hidden mystery. It did not require a Joint Commission of Inquiry to be ascertained, although I am profoundly thankful that such a commission instituted a thorough investigation of the subject. The storm was inevitable; discerning men saw it brewing and were prepared when it burst. It was not peculiar to this country; its sweep was through the whole world. First, it tore asunder economic conditions in Japan. The disaster there almost instantly reflected itself by the break in the silk market in March of 1920. The next manifestation of distress was in May, when the wool industry utterly collapsed and we had presented the phenomena of wool cheaper than cotton. Then came the break in hides and leather; then in sugar, wheat, cotton, corn, oats—all conspiring to create alarm and to occasion distress throughout the country.

Did deflation of credits by the Federal reserve banks, on order of the Federal Reserve Board, cause the crisis in Japan? Did a restriction of credit cause the violent prostration of the wool industry? Did the drop in sugar, which threatened a moratorium in Cuba and which came not far from wrecking one of the great banking institutions of this country because of a satiety of credit, have its origin in any policy of the Federal reserve banking system? If not, how may it rationally be contended that a restriction of credit, which never took place, by an order which was never issued, is responsible for the crash in prices of other commodities?

Mr. President, we are accustomed to get periodically more or less definite estimates of crop production, and then think we have envisaged the entire problem of prices for a given time. As a matter of fact, we have only half of the picture. It may be told with a reasonable degree of certainty what will be the supply, but nobody can ever tell what will be the demand for the products of farm or factory. Senators know perfectly well that all continental Europe, as well as the Near and Far East, has been embroiled in war and plagued by economic disasters since the armistice was proclaimed; so that our foreign markets were dislocated.

Moreover, the peak of extortionate prices in this country had all but pierced the clouds in the early summer of 1920, exceeding actually the highest point of the war period.

I pause to remark that we are a peculiar people in America. For months and months Senators and newspapers throughout the country were denouncing profiteering in the prices of commodities and of all conceivable articles of commerce. They were eager to put the profiteers in jail. They wanted to impeach the Attorney General of the United States for not quickly putting them in jail. Then, when the drop came, these impatient souls denounced the Federal Reserve Board.

THE SENATE ORDERED DEFLATION.

Mr. McLEAN. I remind the Senator that in May, 1920, we passed a resolution for an investigation of the cause of high prices, and at that time condemned the Federal Reserve Board for not raising its rediscount rate.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and I shall show that you practically undertook, without any authority of law, to compel the Federal Reserve Board to raise its rediscount rate. The Senate voted for a resolution unanimously, offered by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], demanding to know what the Federal Reserve Board had done, or what it purposed to do, to deflate the credits and currency of the country. Senators are making me anticipate my speech.

[At this point Mr. GLASS yielded the floor for the day.]

Tuesday, January 17, 1922.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, when the Senate recessed on yesterday I had covered those phases of the problem under discussion which related particularly to the question of alleged deflation of credits and currency in this country and was undertaking to describe the causes and course of the fall in prices.

CONSUMERS ON STRIKE.

The peak of extortionate prices in the United States, as I said before, had all but pierced the clouds in the early summer of 1920, exceeding actually the highest point of the war period, and the people of the United States had become tired of being profiteered and the people of Europe could no longer pay the prices. At home and abroad the people in their righteous indignation went on strike, as it were, against the profiteers. That vitally affected the situation, because when the people once began to do without luxuries, by the very processes of psychology they began to economize in the more necessary things of life. The demand for all products was thus enormously diminished. Then railroad rates were skyrocketed, not alone putting a tax on the things which the farmer must transport to market, but likewise on everything which the farmer was compelled to bring back to the farm. Building was reduced to the minimum, road construction was stopped, furnaces from one end of the country to the other were banked, unemployment to a frightful extent ensued; and all this, Mr. President, for no lack of credit facilities, but for lack of markets in which to sell the products of farm and mill and factory. There is the picture! Why not tell the farmer and everybody else the truth about the thing? Why invent the wretched fiction about deflation of bank credits, and by this false predicate seek to impair the usefulness and ultimately to destroy a banking system that preserved this country from chaos and that, if let alone, will restore the financial equilibrium of the world, if it be not already beyond restoration?

WHY FARMERS SUFFERED FIRST.

The consequences of this crash in commodity prices were more pitiful to the American farmer, because the pelting storm found him defenseless and without shelter. The factory men and mercantile interests, both jobbers and retailers, have better insurance against sudden collapse. They are more compactly organized; they may longer resist falling prices than the farmer. I do not charge that they are more acquisitive; but at least they do not find themselves obliged to accept their losses as promptly as the farmer. This is why the farmer was hit first, and hit hardest and suffered most. Why not tell the farmer the truth and advise him, if he would escape the consequences of another such disaster, he should organize; organize, Mr. President, not to be the plaything or the instrument of designing politicians, but organize for an intelligent investigation and pursuit of economics; organize for a cooperative marketing of his product; organize, if it may seem desirable, for the cooperative purchase of his requirements; organize for an intelligent understanding of the source and volume of demand for farm products.

I commend to the consideration of every intelligent American farmer the report of the Joint Commission of Inquiry upon the Agricultural Crisis and Its Causes; and to indicate that I have not to-day in anywise misstated the situation, I will here quote a paragraph to be found on page 17 from the report in question on—

THE BREAK IN PRICES.

The crisis was not confined to this country. The avalanche of declining prices and its attending hardships, sacrifices, and losses involved the whole world. It began in distant Japan with the break in the silk market and the Chinese boycott of Japanese goods. It traveled the circle of the Far East, Australia, India, Java, England, France, Italy, the whole of Europe, South America, Canada, and the United States. It embraced all countries and all industries, though not to the same extent or in the same way.

Mr. President, the difficulties of the farmers of the United States can not be cured by listening to the sickening rhetoric of politicians or professional agitators. Recurrent distress can not be averted by indefensible assaults upon the integrity of the Federal reserve system or defamatory accusations against the clean, courageous, trained men who are engaged in its administration. The farmers of the country can be helped in two practical ways, one of which involves the strengthening rather than impairment of the Federal reserve system itself.

NONMEMBER BANKERS POWERLESS.

I draw the attention of Senators from the agricultural sections of the country to the fact that a large part of the banking power of their States is wholly independent of the Federal reserve banking system and refuses to avail itself of the tremendous advantages of the system. In the South 42 per cent of the banking power of that entire section is lodged with nonmember banks, institutions which had no access in the recent crisis to the currency vaults or credit facilities of the Federal reserve banks. They were powerless to help the situation because they could not avail themselves of the rediscount privileges of this great banking institution.

Very likely, Mr. President, most of the State banks did what they could in the circumstances; possibly they responded to the limit of their facilities to the demand of the agricultural interests for bank credit; but they were not members of the Federal reserve banking system and had no access to its advantages.

In the Middle Western States 39 per cent of the banking power of all that region is lodged with banks which do not belong to the Federal reserve system; they likewise were powerless to help in this crisis which so afflicted not only the agricultural interests but every interest in this country.

In the far Western States, the great grain-growing section, 50 per cent of the banking power of that region is lodged in banks that are not members of the Federal reserve system; they are powerless, beyond their own restricted resources, to aid in any national crisis. And in the Pacific States 36 per cent of the banking power is lodged in banks outside the Federal reserve system. These nonmember banks have total resources amounting to $19,144,393,000, which were availed of in that crisis to only a limited extent because these banks were not members of the Federal reserve system.

A STARTLING FACT.

If some Senators will go home and talk sense to bankers who remain outside the pale of protection, instead of talking nonsense to farmers and arousing prejudice against the Federal reserve banking system, which has afforded them protection, something worth while will be accomplished. Why, Mr. President, on August 22, 1907, when that great financial crash which started in New York traversed this country, the total rediscounts and bills payable of all national banks in the United States was but $59,177,000. I ask Senators particularly to note this fact: All the rediscounts and bills payable of all the national banks of the United States on the 22d day of August, 1907, under the old bank system, were but $59,177,000, whereas in the month of October, 1920, in the midst of falling prices, the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City alone advanced the member banks of the single agricultural State of Nebraska over $38,000,000, which was more than half the entire amount of rediscounts and bills payable of all the national banks of the United States when the great crash came in 1907.

The Federal reserve bank at Richmond during the recent crisis loaned the member banks of the single State of South Carolina $21,105,000, nearly as much as one-half of the total rediscounts and bills payable of all the national banks in the United States under the old banking system in the panic of 1907. And so I might go from State to State pointing out the vast advantages of the system, the incomparable aid rendered by it, and yet Senators, ignoring these great achievements, persist in misrepresenting the operations of this institution to the farmers of the country.

BANKS ALARMINGLY EXTENDED.

The distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is by no means a stranger to this system or the system to the Senator, who had something to do with its fabrication, and who, I am glad to be told, has renounced his suggestion to legislate out of office the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board——

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a statement right there?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. It was a coincidence that at that time section 2 of the proposed bill that I introduced under its terms would have had the effect of legislating the governor of the system out of office.

Mr. GLASS. I accept that statement. I was merely referring to the effect of the proposed legislation.

Mr. SMITH. I understand; but, inasmuch as the impression has gone abroad that that was the object of the legislation I want to state—and I know the Senator from Virginia is glad to correct that impression—that it was entirely erroneous.

Mr. GLASS. Absolutely so.

Mr. SMITH. When that bill was drafted none of us, including myself who drafted it, had any knowledge whatever as to whom it would affect. We merely provided that the first vacancy should be availed of because we wanted to expedite the presence on the board of a man identified with the agricultural interests.

Mr. GLASS. I accept that statement fully, Mr. President; but I fear my friend may entertain a misconception as to what was done or left undone in South Carolina by the Federal reserve bank of that district in the unprecedented crisis of 1920. I do not know and do not undertake to say anything about the credit facilities afforded by nonmember banks of South Carolina; but the figures show there was scarcely a member bank in that great cotton State which was not amazingly expanded beyond its basic line of credit with the Federal reserve bank at Richmond during the entire period of falling prices. I have the list on my desk here now. I have the figures from other States. There were not many borrowing banks in the State of the eminent Senator from Alabama, the basic credit of which was not tremendously exceeded. There were some banks in Alabama—national banks, member banks—entitled to a basic line of credit of $8,000,000 in that period which did not borrow one dollar from the Federal reserve bank in order to assist the farmers of that State and section? Why does not the Senator go home and assail these local banks, not one of which borrowed as much as one dollar from the Federal reserve banks, although they were entitled to a basic line of credit of $8,000,000; and had they followed the example of banks in Alabama and other States and transcended their basic line ten times they might have borrowed many times $8,000,000 from the Federal reserve bank in order to help their farmers, whereas they did not borrow a dime. Why did they not borrow? The rediscount rate at that time was but 6 per cent. They had a margin of 2 per cent. Why did they not borrow if it would help the farmer? Why come here and denounce the Federal reserve banking system when the trouble, if there was really a deficiency of credit, was inherent at home?

Mr. President, to give the laymen in the Senate—one of whom I am—a concrete illustration of how the Federal reserve banks went to the rescue of business in the cotton territory of the United States, let me present some facts and figures:

Here is a South Carolina national bank entitled under the rule of basic credit to borrow $29,000 from the Federal reserve bank at Richmond. On June 30, 1920, when cotton was about at its peak, it was borrowing $74,000, until by progressive stages is was borrowing on June 30, 1921, $212,000 from the Federal reserve bank. Think of it! It was entitled to borrow as its fair quota, $29,000, and it borrowed $212,000. Here is another bank which was entitled to borrow $37,000 from the Federal reserve bank at Richmond. On June 30, 1920, it was borrowing $91,000 when cotton was highest. On a falling market it managed to increase its loans at the Federal reserve bank to $200,000.

Here is another little bank with a basic line of credit at the Federal reserve bank of $23,000 in that period of stress; it borrowed from the reserve system $111,000; and another little bank, entitled to borrow $46,000, was loaned $235,000 by the Federal reserve bank at Richmond.

These furnish a fair example of the operations of the smaller banks of this State. Here is a larger bank, entitled to borrow $578,000 from its Federal reserve bank; it borrowed $1,467,000. Here is another entitled to borrow $468,000 as its quota of credits at the Federal reserve bank; to meet emergency it was loaned $2,622,000. All of the member banks combined of South Carolina were entitled to borrow $7,699,000; they borrowed $21,105,000 during the period of falling prices.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, does the Senator mean by that statement that that amount of credits were out at one time?

Mr. GLASS. I do; on each given date.

Mr. POMERENE. And I assume that that statement applies to each of the other illustrations which the Senator has given?

Mr. GLASS. It does.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, do these figures apply to conditions generally over the country or simply to these particular States or regions?

Mr. GLASS. They apply to the country; but the charge here has been that there was discrimination in the agricultural sections, and I am undertaking to show that that is utterly groundless.

CURSE OF TOO MUCH CREDIT.

Mr. President, not infrequently too much credit is a worse curse than too little. It allures individuals and corporations into the morass of financial disaster. Attempts to make too much money frequently result in losing all one has. Of course, some of us can see now what we could not see 18 months ago; but the one thing that clearly stands out is the fact that, had the banks of the country curtailed loans just before the drop in prices, as is mistakenly charged, instead of lavishly extending loans, as authenticated figures attest, thousands of people who are now in distress would be happy and content. For the good of borrowers themselves, the member banks and the Federal reserve banks too long delayed liquidation. They loaned too much money rather than too little; at least, that would be my criticism of their administration.

NEW SYSTEM NEEDED.

I quite agree, Mr. President, in the next place, that there is need in this country for a strictly rural-credits system, adapted to the peculiar wants and processes of the agricultural communities. Such a system conjoined with the existing Federal land-bank system, extending long-time seasonal credits, embracing crop preparation and production as well as orderly and advantageous marketing, would be of inestimable value to the farmers of the United States. This matter was being meditated when the advent of war diverted the attention and absorbed the activities of statesmen at Washington. We can not too soon renew consideration of the subject with a purpose to devise a system that will do for the farming community of the United States what the Federal reserve system immeasurably has done for the commercial and industrial interests of the country. But, Mr. President, you can not build up a long-time credit system by picking to pieces or by impairing the liquidity and the general efficiency of the existing commercial banking system. The two systems may successfully operate side by side, sympathetically and helpful, but the moment you undertake to transform one halfway into the other you will produce a financial prodigy, part fish and part fowl, which will neither swim nor crow.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in view of the statement which the Senator from Virginia has made with regard to an extension of the system of personal rural credits, I might add that there is now a joint commission composed of Members of the Senate and of the House who are studying that question. They have been taking some testimony on this subject, and I think next week they are to take testimony in the city of Atlanta.

Mr. GLASS. That, of course, I am glad to know.

WARNINGS NOT HEEDED.

Adverting, Mr. President, to the "cruel and murderous" policy of deflation which, as I have shown, never actually had any existence outside the vivid imagination of perplexed politicians, it has been said here that the alleged policy would have been sound in fact had it been applied gradually. I contend that no policy of deflation was applied for the period indicated; but if it be meant that ample warning was not given against a continuation of the wild orgy of speculation and of the alarming inflation of credits and currency at an angle at one period of 45 degrees, it can clearly be demonstrated that warning after warning was given. The Treasury, time and again, literally implored people to desist from their inordinate extravagance, and the public press was filled with editorials of caution against the riot of expenditure.

The very first official function I performed as Secretary of the Treasury was urgently to insist on the continuance of the Money Committee, composed of patriotic, public-spirited New York bankers, to administer a large fund designed to restrict the rate of interest on commercial transactions to 6 per cent. Meanwhile call money was soaring as high as 30 per cent on speculative transactions. Many bankers insisted that money was worth what it would bring in a competitive market, and a distinguished ex-governor of New Jersey bitterly assailed the restrictive policy of the Treasury, which was, of course, merely in the nature of moral restraint and in no sense compulsory.

The members of this Money Committee served without compensation, submitting patiently to the violent condemnation of those who selfishly desired to tax commerce with a high rate of interest on borrowed money. I cite this incident to show that as early as in the fall of 1918 the public had warning that interest rates were being held in leash only by a resort to extraordinary expedients.

CONGRESS FAVORED DEFLATION.

In the late fall of 1919 the governors of the larger Federal reserve banks were invited to Washington, and were urged by the Secretary of the Treasury to warn member banks that speculative credits must be curtailed or legitimate commerce would soon be penalized and a condition presented which would shock the country. Even then we were discussing the advisability of increasing the rediscount rates of the Federal reserve banks, and House and Senate, impatient and peremptory, were sending up resolutions demanding to know what steps the Federal Reserve Board was taking or contemplating to check the frightful inflation of credits and currency. One of these resolutions barely missed being an explicit order. It was adopted unanimously by the Senate on May 17, 1920, and reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be directed to advise the Senate what steps it purposes to take or to recommend to the member banks of the Federal reserve system to meet the existing inflation of currency and credits and consequent high prices, and what further steps it purposes to take or recommend to mobilize credits in order to move the 1920 crop.

The Treasury experts, advised by some of the most eminent bankers of the country, held the view that any appreciable increase in the rediscount rate of the Federal reserve banks would accentuate the difficulties of floating the Victory loans and greatly impede the certificate borrowings of the Government, amounting to billions of dollars. My personal view also was that speculative loans should first be curtailed before we began assessing higher interest charges against legitimate commerce.

All these things were conspicuously discussed in the public press, particularly in the financial journals of the country. But the various warnings went unheeded; speculation flourished; credits in greater degree expanded. The country was aghast at the range of prices and the high cost of living. England was in worse plight. The Bank of England advanced its discount rate to 6 per cent and in January, 1920, the larger Federal reserve banks, soon followed by other regional banks, advanced the rate here to 6 and later to 7 per cent. Did these advances in the rediscount rates serve as a warning that a day of reckoning soon must come? Did this action by the Federal reserve banks, approved by the Federal Reserve Board, and practically urged by resolutions of Senate and House months before, result in tightening the reins? One only has to examine the figures I have presented here to see that the inflation of credits still persisted; that the volume of the currency continued to increase; that even after commodity prices began to topple the Federal reserve banks made a desperate effort to impede the velocity of the fall. From January 1, 1920, to January 1, 1921, these reserve banks expanded loans to member banks in an amount approaching $1,000,000,000. Yet, Mr. President, in the very face of this indisputable evidence, Senators berate the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks with the utterly false charge of ordering and executing a policy of "murderous deflation." Such talk is wicked mummery.

PASSING THE BUCK.

Mr. President, Senators may wonder how this misconception got abroad about "the deflation of credits and currency." One way in which it got abroad was the willingness, first, of politicians, and then of local banks, to "pass the buck"—I believe that is the phrase—to the Federal Reserve Board and banks. Agitators advised the cotton interests of the South to hold their cotton for 50 cents. They held it; and instead of getting 50 cents it fell to 11 cents. When the slump came and disaster ensued, these evil advisers got from under their mistaken advice by "laying it on the Federal Reserve Board." I have in mind now one of these agitators who advised the cotton planters of the South to hold their cotton for 50 cents. He has been maligning the Federal Reserve Board, although his own bank was extended nearly 300 per cent above its proper quota. Of course, he tells his victims that "the Federal Reserve Board did it."

In the fall of 1920, campaigning in Virginia, I learned that a bank in one of the counties where I was making a speech had refused credits to its customers and had told these patrons that it refused them credit because it "could not get any rediscounts at the Federal reserve bank at Richmond." It was a nonmember bank. It had no right to rediscounts at the Federal reserve bank. It had loaned $96,000 for the purchase of automobiles, and had no more money to loan; and, not wanting to admit its plight, it told its borrowers it could not loan money because the Federal reserve bank—of which it was not a member—would not rediscount its paper!

I have here a form of notice sent out by a bank in an agricultural district to many of its borrowers, which reads as follows:

Your note for $_____ falls due _____.

Our Federal Reserve Bank owns this note, having rediscounted it for us. As it has been renewed several times, they are insisting on a payment. It is absolutely necessary to arrange this note on the day of its maturity.

Yours, truly,

_____ _____,
Cashier.

There was not a word of truth in that; and as soon as the Federal Reserve Board found that notices of this sort were being disseminated throughout that district by member banks it issued an order exposing the deception and expostulating against it.

I have here a letter from a business man of Tennessee, written to the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, saying:

On September 20 I offered to the Farmers' Bank of _____ $2,250 of third and fourth Liberty loan bonds, as collateral for a 30-day $1,000 loan; this they refused to grant, because they claimed they did not have the money and could not get it.

And he wants to know "why the Federal reserve bank is restricting credits in that way." Gov. Harding wrote him, in acknowledgment of the letter, saying:

While the Federal Reserve Board can not compel a Federal reserve bank to rediscount paper for a member bank which, in the opinion of its discount committee, is undesirable, I feel certain that the Federal reserve bank would cheerfully have rediscounted your note for the Farmers' National Bank with the bonds as security had it been offered.

Of course, it would have done it. That sort of deception by banks that do not desire to make loans has largely produced the impression throughout the country to which I have referred. Nonmember banks finding an excuse for not accommodating their patrons, and member banks not having the courage to refuse a loan, "pass the buck" to the Federal reserve banks of the country.

THE CHARGE OF "EXTORTION."

A great clatter has been raised about the alleged "extortionate" interest charges of the Federal reserve banks; but, as in other respects, a half truth only is told. The real facts are conveniently suppressed.

The "progressive" interest charge was not a feature of the original reserve act; it was put in about three years ago by Congress. It was intended by Congress as a penal provision. It was not designed to aid borrowing banks; it was intended to penalize any bank that should persist in borrowing more than its fair quota of the funds of a reserve bank, thereby depriving some other member bank of its fair basic line. If Congress did not want that done it should not have authorized it to be done.

But, Mr. President, this "progressive" interest charge was put into effect by but 4 of the 12 reserve banks. By these it was applied to comparatively few borrowing banks in their districts. These banks were incorrigible offenders against every requirement of cautious and safe banking. They were perpetually exceeding their allotted line of credits; they were incessantly appropriating more than their fair share of reserve bank funds. But the assailants of the reserve system suppress these facts. They fail also to tell those whom they mislead that the average rediscount rate charged by the Federal reserve banks against the great body of borrowing banks in the four districts where "progressive" rates were very occasionally applied was much below the rate charged by these borrowing banks against their own customers.

Take the case of the one little bank in the Atlanta district, the evil fate of which has so lustily been bewailed here and elsewhere. This bank was far below its lawful reserve for 11 months out of 12. It exceeded its basic line of credit nearly ten times. Ninety per cent of its capital was loaned on notes indorsed by its president. It seems to have outraged every rule of sound banking. It was penalized under the act of Congress in order to restrain its excesses and to compel it to get back in line. It could not have complained fairly had it been put in the hands of a receiver. When it had been forced to abate its excesses the amount of the "progressive" rate was returned to it. I doubt if this should have been done.

But why pick out a few rare and extreme cases of offending banks like this and make it appear that the Federal reserve system is "extortionate," when its general interest rate to the great multitude of borrowing banks was not only moderate but far below the average rate charged business men by these borrowing banks? Why judge the system by the discipline administered to a few banks which persisted in "running amuck" of sane banking practices, and ignore the generous and beneficent treatment accorded the many thousands of banks throughout the Nation? Does not this very thing exhibit the enemies of the system in their nakedness? What evil motive could a reserve bank have to charge excessive rates when in no event can it pay its stockholding banks above 6 per cent in dividends? What unworthy prompting could the Reserve Board have in sanctioning excessive charges, when the board itself derives no single penny of profit from any transactions of the banks? Is not the utter foolishness of such talk deplorable?

A DESIGNING PHRASE.

It has been asserted by Senators that if the Federal reserve banks had extended as great a percentage of credits to the "country" banks as were extended to the member banks in the great central reserve cities—New York, Chicago, and St. Louis—there would have been a billion dollars more to loan on agricultural products. Mr. President, already I have pointed out that credit was not the urgent need of any rationally operated business interest in this country. The crying need was markets, not greater banking facilities. But let me expose the specious nature of this play upon the phrase "country banks," the evident purpose being to produce the impression that "country" banks necessarily engage in financing agricultural products.

As a matter of fact, every national bank in New England, outside of the city of Boston, is classed as a "country" bank. Every bank in the great State of New York, outside New York City, Albany, and Buffalo is classed as a "country" bank; and until recently all the banks in the great industrial city of Buffalo were "country" banks. Every bank in the State of New Jersey is a "country" bank, and every bank in the great industrial State of Pennsylvania outside Philadelphia and Pittsburgh is a "country" bank. And so nearly all national banks in the industrial State of Ohio are "country" banks and all in Illinois outside Chicago and Peoria and in Missouri outside St. Louis and Kansas City. Most of these banks are engaged in financing industrial enterprises and not agricultural products especially. Had they borrowed greater sums from their Federal reserve banks there is no assurance, indeed it is incredible to believe, that such funds would have been devoted to the use of agriculture. Senators who use this insinuating argument fail to state that, because of their larger reserve requirements, member banks in these great central reserve cities are obliged to borrow about twice as much to keep up their 13 per cent reserve as a country bank has to borrow to keep up its less than 7 per cent reserve. These Senators, with design, simply invoke the tyranny of a phrase to make it appear that farmers are the victims of discrimination, when facts and figures show it is not true.

PRINTING PRESS ECONOMICS.

Mr. President, there is one other aspect of this subject to which I think allusion ought to be made. I shall do that very briefly, because I do not want to deprive other Senators of an opportunity to discuss this problem in detail and to reply to anything I have said. If, as it may be, I have said anything that is inaccurate, I want to be corrected. If I have drawn any deductions which are not warranted, I want them exposed.

It has been said in some quarters that the Federal Reserve Board might have disregarded the reserve requirements of the Federal reserve bank act, and by doing so have issued other billions of dollars of notes and credits; and that is true. That is what England did, Mr. President, and her foreign exchange became dislocated, her trade for a long time was gravely impaired, and in some directions destroyed; that is what France did, and the currency of the nation was debased; that is what Germany did and is doing to-day, and the mark is worth hardly a half cent. That is the doctrine of Lenin—the printing-press doctrine—and look at the plight of Russia, where it takes a million rubles to buy 10 pounds of butter! At that rate it would take a trainload of printing-press "money" to buy a bale of cotton.

Yes, the Federal Reserve Board might have pursued the policy which has been suggested; but had it done so, instead of our country being the financial Gibraltar of the world it would have been drawn into the frightful maelstrom of currency depreciation and credit debasement. I can not conform my judgment to that of men who advocate the "printing-press" doctrine practiced by Lenin and under which in Russia to-day the material upon which rubles are printed is worth more as waste paper than it is as authenticated currency.

AN HISTORICAL PARALLEL.

Coming from a center of culture and familiar with the epochal events of history, you will recall, Mr. President, that several decades before the French Revolution the currency of France was the product of the printing press; and the business of the kingdom was thereby depressed beyond the imagination of men. Those in power enacted a law making it a penal offense for the farmers of France to discriminate against paper "money" in favor of coin of the realm.

The penalty was a heavy fine and long imprisonment in jail. Later the rulers, still thinking they might compel credit by legislation, amended the law with a view to effective enforcement; they made it a capital crime to discriminate between paper and metallic currency. Eventually the heads of many of these economic jugglers dropped into the basket—a just recompense of their folly and profanation of power. That is the kind of currency with which some Senators would have us flood this country; but I venture to think, if we should follow their lead, that the farmers of the South and West would soon shrink from it as they would from the drippings of a pest house.

It is a wise man that considers the purchasing power of money. There are superficial people who would rather receive a wage of $5 a day, when it costs them $6 a day to live, than to receive a wage of $2.50 a day, when it costs them $1.50 to live. One signifies ruin and the other betokens thrift; yet there are many people who fail to discriminate; who fail to understand the purchasing power of the dollar.

Mr. President, should we deplete our gold reserves and set the printing press in motion we would literally ruin the country. I know the junior Senator from Alabama thinks the printing press was invented to print "money."

ALLEGED EXTRAVAGANCE EXAMINED.

Mr. President, it has been a staple criticism in this Chamber that the Federal reserve banks are being operated in an exorbitantly extravagant way in the payment of salaries and general expenditures, and this charge has been amplified into the amazing statement that because the Government of the United States is the residuary claimant of all earnings of the banks after the disbursement of 6 per cent of the capital, these excess salaries and expenditures in building operations amounted to a theft by the Federal Reserve Board from the United States Treasury. I am no advocate of extravagant expenditures in either Government or private institutions.

I think had I been a member of the Federal Reserve Board, except in the direst necessity, I would not have agreed to expend one dollar in building operations at this time, because of the enormous profiteering of the building trades both by people who supply material and those who furnish labor. Investigations of the Lockwood committee in New York show appalling graft. They indicate a state of affairs which ought to land in jail many persons who now are going at large.

I hold no brief for the Federal Reserve Board on this point. It may be that some excessive salaries have been paid in the system. It may be that some expenditures have been too large and others may have been deferred. But we can arrive at a correct conclusion in such matters only by comparing relative facts. Let us see, then, how the expenses of the Federal reserve banking system appear in contrast with the expenses of the great central bank of the most thrifty nation on earth.

A FAIR CONTRAST.

The last official report of the Bank of France shows a total amount paid to the State out of the last year's profits of approximately 104,000,000 francs, or, at the old basis of exchange parity, something like $21,000,000. At the same time, there was paid to stockholders by the Bank of France approximately 47,000,000 francs, or about the equivalent of $9,500,000. The capital of the bank was 182,500,000 francs, or about $36,500,000.

In the Federal reserve system for the year 1920, with a capital of approximately $94,000,000, the payments to the Government amounted to something like $60,000,000, while the balance was either paid to stockholders or carried to surplus account. In this way the stockholding banks received a total of about $5,000,000, as against the $9,500,000 paid by the Bank of France to its stockholders. It will easily be seen that the amount obtained by the Government of France from the operations of its great central bank, now nearly a century and a quarter old, was far less than obtained by the Government of the United States from the Federal reserve system, while the amount paid by the Bank of France to its stockholders was almost double what was paid by the Federal reserve system to its stockholders, who are the constituent member banks.

Mr. President, the Bank of France states the total of its expenses of administration during the year 1920, including depreciation, salaries, and pensions, at approximately 150,000,000 francs, or the equivalent, at old rates of exchange, of about $30,000,000. For the year 1920 the expenses of administration of the Federal reserve system were reported in the annual report of the Federal Reserve Board as having been approximately $30,000,000. When it is remembered, Mr. President, that the total loan and discount operations of the Federal reserve system, with 12 great banks and 23 branches, were in the neighborhood of $85,000,000,000 in 1920, while the total discounts and advances, other than to the Government, of the Bank of France amounted at old rates of exchange to roughly $12,000,000,000, a comparison between the cost of operating the two institutions may easily be drawn—by no means to the discredit of the Federal reserve system.

OFFICIAL SALARIES CONSIDERED.

Mr. President, I desire to supplement the foregoing general comparison of expenses between the Bank of France and the Federal reserve system with a brief reference in detail to the official salaries prevailing in the various Federal reserve banks with the official salaries in individual member banks of the various Federal reserve districts. Let us note the case first of the New York Federal Reserve Bank, against which criticism has been most violent. Its total annual salary account is $509,800 for its 40 officers, an average of $12,745, contrasted with an annual salary account of $768,200 for 67 officers of one large member bank, an average of $11,466.

Another large member bank in New York City with 82 officers has a total annual salary account of $1,574,500, or an average of $19,201 for each officer. The comparison with a kindred result might be extended to other individual banks in New York. The governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank receives a salary of $50,000, and I may say to the Senate that before he went with the Federal reserve system he was receiving a salary of $60,000.

Mr. POMERENE. May I add, in this connection, without naming him, that I know of one of these presidents who is getting a salary of $25,000, and he has standing open now two offers of $50,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why does he not take one of them?

Mr. POMERENE. Because he wants to devote himself to the public service.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will permit an interruption, does the Senator think that a salary of $50,000 is too much, or is it fair? Is the Senator in favor of paying a salary of $50,000, or permitting it to be paid by the Federal reserve bank?

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that, in this particular time of stress, I would think it bad policy to pay the president of even so great an institution as the Federal Reserve Bank of New York as much as $50,000. Furthermore, when it was first suggested to me, while I was chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the other branch of Congress, to fix the salary at that figure, I protested that the time was inopportune to pay a salary that large. I thought it should be deferred; I believed the bank would incur the very sort of criticism it has incurred.

But Senators must remember that a bank can not be conducted by hod carriers; you can not even run it with a Congressman in charge, or a newspaper publisher, as I am. You have to get expert banking talent and technical skill of the highest description to run a great bank like the New York Federal Reserve Bank, and you have to get it in open competition with great individual banks. The Senate should remember this in considering the matter. Two member banks in New York City pay their president $100,000 per annum each; 3 member banks pay their president $75,000 per annum; 1 member bank pays its vice president $75,000; 1 pays the chairman of its board of directors $65,000; 4 member banks pay their vice presidents $50,000; and 22 other member banks pay their vice presidents all the way from $25,000 to $40,000. So that by contrast, Mr. President, the salary of the governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, greater in volume of business transacted than the Bank of England or the Bank of France and of any five Federal reserve banks combined, is not so astounding as one might be led to suppose without any examination of the facts.

The Boston Federal Reserve Bank has a total annual salary expenditure of $135,500 for 14 officers, an average of $9,679, as contrasted with one member bank having 25 officers with a total salary expenditure of $411,200, an average of $16,448; another member bank with 21 officers has a salary account of $298,000, an average of $14,190. This comparison likewise might be extended to other member banks with a similar result. The governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston receives $25,000. One member bank of the Boston district pays its president $75,000, another $50,000, and another $40,000. One member bank pays its vice presidents $42,000. Many of them pay their vice presidents salaries ranging from $25,000 to $42,000. So that in Boston, as in New York, officials of the Federal reserve bank, doing vastly more business than any member bank, indeed vastly more business than many member banks combined, receive very much smaller salaries than many individual banks pay to their officers.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia pays its governor $25,000. One individual member bank in Philadelphia pays its president $80,000; one other pays $45,000; another, $36,000; another, $25,000; one pays its vice president $40,000. The official salary account of this regional bank has an average much lower than the individual member banks of the district.

The Federal reserve bank at Cleveland pays it governor $30,000. One individual member bank at Cleveland pays its president $50,000; another pays its president $36,000; another pays $35,000; the vice presidents of various other Cleveland banks get in excess of $30,000. The general salary account of this bank averages very much less than the salary account of the individual banks of Philadelphia.

The governor of the Federal reserve bank at Richmond gets $18,000. The president of one member bank at Richmond gets $25,000; and of another, $25,000. The general salary account of the reserve bank at Richmond just about matches that of the various member banks.

The governor of the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta gets $18,000. The president of one member bank at Atlanta gets $20,000; another, $17,500. The vice president of one bank there gets $18,000. The salary account of the Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank averages very much less than the salary account of the individual member banks.

The governor of the Federal reserve bank at Chicago gets $35,000. The chairman of the board of directors of one Chicago bank gets $75,000 and another $60,000, and the President of one Chicago bank gets $50,000 and another $36,000. Many vice presidents of individual member banks at Chicago get salaries running from $25,000 to $37,500. The average official salary paid by the Chicago reserve bank is about one-half the average official salary of the individual member banks.

The governor of the Federal reserve bank at St. Louis gets $25,000. The president of one member bank at St. Louis gets $50,000 and another $45,000; one executive manager gets $40,000 and another $35,000. Several vice presidents get $25,000. The average of official salaries for this reserve bank is much less than the average for member banks.

The salary of the governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis gets $16,000. One president of the Minneapolis National Bank gets $45,000; another, $40,000; and several executive chairmen and vice presidents get salaries of $25,000. The average official salary for this bank is a little more than half the average for member banks.

The governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City gets a salary of $20,000. The president of one individual member bank there gets $26,000 and two $25,000 each. The average salary at the St. Louis bank is very much less than at the individual member banks.

The salary of the governor of the Dallas Federal Reserve Bank is $18,000. The salary of a president of one member bank is $20,000 and the two vice presidents each $25,000. The average official salary at the reserve bank is very much less than the average paid at member banks.

The Federal reserve bank at San Francisco pays it governor $24,000. The president of two individual member banks gets $50,000 and of another $36,000. The average official salary is less than half at the reserve bank than at the individual member banks.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. GLASS. I hope Senators will let me hurry through, because I desire to conclude.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator does not care to be disturbed, I will not interrupt him.

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I merely wanted to inquire of the Senator if he thought there was any difference between the responsibility of a bank which is dealing only with securities coming through and indorsed by other banks and that of a bank which is dealing with individual paper.

Mr. GLASS. I think when we consider that the president of the New York Reserve Bank and the board of directors thereof are directly responsible for $5,000,000,000 in cash and securities, the greatest gold reserve that ever was mobilized since the world began to revolve on its axis, we must admit that the responsibility of those officers is infinitely greater than that of the officers of a dozen individual banks combined.

SALARIES FIXED BY DIRECTORS.

It must be understood, Mr. President, that these salaries are fixed by the board of directors of these respective Federal reserve banks, two-thirds of which directors are selected by the stockholding banks of each district and all of them citizens of the district. The Federal Reserve Board has the right of review with respect to these salaries, but it must be admitted that the regional board of directors, familiar with all the conditions, circumstances, and extent of labor involved, knows better than the Federal Reserve Board—knows vastly better than Congress—what are the actual requirements and what is a fair average compensation. At all events the Federal Reserve Board does not initiate these salaries, and to say that honorable men who constitute this board should be indicted by a Federal grand jury because they approve the considered judgment of the boards of directors of these regional banks is to make a declaration that should not enhance the reputation of a Senator for sanity or for temperate speech.

The salary of Gov. Strong, one-half that of several officials of individual banks in New York, was approved by the Federal Reserve Board on motion of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, concurred in by every other member of the board, the vote being unanimous. I realize that gentlemen may differ upon questions of expenditures, particularly with reference to official salaries, but it is monstrous to charge high-minded, patriotic men with theft from the Treasury when we disagree with their judgments.

ASTOUNDING MISCONCEPTIONS.

In this connection, Mr. President, let me show the Senate to what extent misconception and ignorance on these questions may go. Several weeks ago a Senator on this side in a burst of indignation exclaimed:

> If the governor of the Federal Reserve Board is worth $50,000, what is the value to the country of the President of the United States? What is the value of the Vice President?
> Gov. Harding enjoys the luxuriant and luxurious privilege of fixing his own salary. That is a privilege which the President does not enjoy. It is a privilege that the Vice President does not enjoy. It is a privilege that no Senator enjoys, no Congressman enjoys, no admiral in the Navy, no general in the Army, no member of the Supreme Court.
> W. P. G. Harding is the only man that I know of that has been given the power to fix his own salary and to fix the salaries of his subordinates.

Mr. President, I have not the remotest idea that the Senator who made this remarkable deliverance had the faintest purpose to misrepresent the Federal reserve banking system or to treat the governor of the Federal Reserve Board with derision. The Senator thought his premise was correct, hence the emphasis and feeling with which he denounced what seemed to him an extraordinary situation. As a matter of fact, a glance at the Federal reserve act would have shown him that Gov. Harding has no power to fix his own salary or the salaries of any of his subordinates. He can not, except in conjunction with other members of the board, fix the salary of a typist in his office! A glance at the law would have shown this indignant Senator that the salary of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board is definitely fixed by Congress and may not be altered by anything that Gov. Harding or the Federal Reserve Board may do. He would have seen that Gov. Harding's salary is not $50,000. It is but $12,000, so fixed by Congress, not a dollar greater than that of any other member of the board. Seeing these things, the Senator would not have tripped into the mistake of moralizing about evils that do not exist.

I have no intimate personal relations with the governor of the Federal Reserve Board; in no sense or degree am I his spokesman here. But out of my actual observation and knowledge I feel, in very decency, obliged to say to the Senate that I have seen this honorable public official during a fateful period work himself to the bone for his country. I have seen him do the Government's work night and day until his very life was in peril by reason of physical exhaustion and nervous prostration. I myself have driven him from the Treasury Building for a few hours of rest to avert utter collapse.

DEFAMATION OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

I now ask the Senate's attention to a statement even more astonishing than that which I have just confuted. Indeed,

Mr. President, it is a declaration made in this Chamber which should engage the very gravest attention; for, notwithstanding the ludicrous misrepresentations which it comprises, it carries an implication which, if true, affects the integrity of a great Government institution, and which, if false, affects the integrity of the Senate. I am one of those who can not conceive that the constitutional immunity granted Senators and Representatives in Congress was ever intended as a shelter for libel of public men or private citizens, leaving them no means of redress. Some time back the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama, according to the RECORD, said in this Chamber:

> Mr. President, I am not advised as to whether or not any of the friends of the Federal Reserve Board were speculating in cotton at that time. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] reminded us the other day that they loaned to themselves in the system the sum of $18,000,000.

Think of it—a board that can not loan a dollar to an individual or concern or corporation charged with having loaned to its own members $18,000,000!

I continue reading from the statement of the junior Senator from Alabama:

> I want to say just here, Mr. President, that if they invested any of that $18,000,000 in speculating on the bear side of the cotton market in the month of August last year, they made a lot of money.
> Do you know, Mr. President, how much money the man made who sold on the exchange 1,000 bales of cotton for the month of August, 1920? He made on that 1,000 bales $45,000 in cash. The Federal Reserve Board knew what effect its deflation policy would have upon the cotton market. Those who knew that that policy was going to run wild in August last year made millions of dollars to the distress and great injury of the cotton farmers of the country. Between the months of June and December that policy cost the cotton farmers more than $200,000,000 a month. Think of that, Senators! The deliberate and premeditated deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board cost the cotton farmers more than $200,000,000 a month between June and December of last year.

What was the value of the entire cotton crop of the country in 1920, may I ask the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]? How much was it in the aggregate, approximately or roughly?

Mr. DIAL. I would say about $2,000,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. I wanted to know, because a multiplication of the sum given by the Senator from Alabama by the number of months will make it appear that the cotton growers lost pretty nearly the entire crop.

Mr. President, the plain implication here is that members of the Federal Reserve Board had prostituted their sacred trust by using their positions for the purpose of speculating in cotton with the funds of the Federal reserve banks. If the charge is true, these public officials should not only be put in jail but they should be kept there. The alleged act would constitute a crime little short of treason. If the charge is not true, then the Senate should contemplate the injurious effect of such accusations upon its own reputation.

In the period to which reference is made by the Senator from Alabama the members of the Federal Reserve Board were David F. Houston, Secretary of the Treasury in President Wilson's Cabinet; John Skelton Williams, of Virginia, Comptroller of the Currency by appointment of Mr. Wilson; Charles S. Hamlin, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury under President Cleveland; W. P. G. Harding, governor of the board by designation of Mr. Wilson; Adolph S. Miller, a university president of distinction in California; and Edmund Platt, former Representative in Congress and member of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House from New York—all appointees of Mr. Wilson. The implication of crime is leveled by the Senator from Alabama against every one of these men without exception. Is there a Senator here who believes the implication that would impute crime to these honorable public servants? If the Senator from Alabama believes that the accusation which he suggests is not a libel against their names and character, if he thinks he can justify his amazing insinuations, it is his duty to the country to ask for a grand jury investigation of these gentlemen, who have always borne and now sustain a reputation among men for probity and integrity.

But, Mr. President, we do not have to await the verdict of the courts or the findings of a committee to see clearly the utter absurdity of some of these statements. The Federal Reserve Board, it is charged, loaned its own members $18,000,000, which vast sum it is suggested they used to gamble in cotton after deliberately using their official powers to depress the price for their own profit. Perhaps there are cotton pickers on plantations of the South who may be deceived by such trumpery, but surely there is no Member of the Senate who does not understand how absolutely preposterous these accusations are.

The Federal Reserve Board, under the law, could not loan the President of the United States 25 cents; it could not loan the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court a dollar; it could not loan John D. Rockefeller a dime; it could not loan the United States Steel Corporation or the Standard Oil Co. a penny. The Federal Reserve Board has not a dollar to loan and never had a dollar to loan.

No Federal reserve bank in the system can loan any individual or corporation in the United States a penny. The Federal reserve banks neither receive deposits from nor make loans to individuals or concerns or corporations. These banks are banks of banks and do business only with banks; so that if John D. Rockefeller, with all his millions, should desire to borrow money, he would be compelled to borrow it from a local bank; and the only way that the local bank could get a dollar from the Federal reserve bank in Rockefeller's district would be to indorse Mr. Rockefeller's collateral note, as that of any other person, and put it up as security for a credit at the reserve bank. The Federal Reserve Board would not necessarily have any part in or knowledge of the transaction.

Aside from this, Mr. President, no member of the Federal Reserve Board is permitted by law to own one dollar of bank stock or to have any pecuniary interest whatsoever or connection with the operation or profits of any banking institution; and every member of the board has to take a solemn oath to this effect. Moreover, under the law, the Federal reserve banks are strictly prohibited from loaning one dollar to member banks for speculative purposes. Thus the whole charge is so literally without foundation in fact, and so saturated with misunderstanding of Federal reserve banking processes and of the Federal reserve act itself as to render it comic if it were not pitiful.

IGNORANCE RUN MAD!

I venture to invite the attention of Senators and the country to another interesting discovery by the distinguished junior Senator from Alabama. On Friday of last week, in speaking to the Newberry case, the Senator said:

> The Federal Reserve Board got an amendment to the Federal reserve act through a Republican Congress permitting them to set aside a certain percentage of earnings to be used in providing buildings and establishments for use in the service. They accumulated $100,000,000 in a year. What do you suppose they did? Without asking Congress the Federal Reserve Board appropriated $26,000,000 or thereabouts—to do what? To build a bank building in the city of New York in Wall Street.

Mr. President, that statement comprises a paragraph of eight printed lines in the RECORD. It contains six distinctive assertions; all of it is true except the six distinctive assertions. [Laughter.] All of it is true except (1) the amendment to the Federal reserve act was passed by a Democratic Congress, voted for by the Senator from Alabama, then a Member of the other House——

Mr. HEFLIN. I should like to see the RECORD.

Mr. GLASS. I have the RECORD. And was approved by Woodrow Wilson. So we can not make any Democratic politics out of that. The Senator's statement is true except (2) that the Federal Reserve Board did not accumulate $100,000,000 or any other amount; except (3) that the Federal Reserve Board did not appropriate $26,000,000 or any other amount; except (4) that the Federal Reserve Board can not under the law or the operation of the system appropriate one dime for any purpose; except (5) that no Federal reserve bank to cost $26,000,000 is to be built anywhere; except (6) that the proposed new Federal reserve bank building in New York is not to be erected in Wall Street.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Aside from that, the statement is all right.

Mr. GLASS. It is all right with those six exceptions.

Mr. HEFLIN. I should expect the Senator from the State where the big bank building is being erected to agree with the speech of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. With these six exceptions the Senator's statement is true; and this signifies how much reliance may be put in the accuracy of statements made by the Senator from Alabama with respect to the Federal reserve banking system. His assaults are made up of fiction and are almost entirely devoid of facts.

CONGRESS SANCTIONED BUILDINGS.

It is true—and I hope Senators will mark this—that the Federal Reserve Board respectfully asked Congress to permit the Federal reserve banks to increase the amount of their surplus out of their earnings to an amount equal to 100 per cent of their paid capital. Congress exceeded the expectations of the board by having the increase apply to subscribed capital plus 10 per cent permanently to surplus. The board openly and frankly stated that the purpose of the request was, among other things, to provide the various regional reserve banks with better building facilities. Representative Phelan, a Democrat of Massachusetts, chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, presented and explained the amendment in that body. It was voted for unanimously.

The amendment was presented to the Senate by Mr. HITCHCOCK, a Democrat of Nebraska, acting for the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, and was unanimously agreed to here. The bill as passed was approved by Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States. It is now a law and has been for nearly three years.

MORE MISINFORMATION.

After first charging the reputable gentlemen who constitute the board of directors of the New York Federal Reserve Bank with being criminals, the Senator from Alabama proceeds:

Mr. President, I can not get away from these figures without looking at them once more. A bank building in Wall Street, ordered to be constructed by the Federal Reserve Board of seven men, is to cost around $26,000,000 * * *. It seems to me to be surrounded and covered over with the atmosphere of graft.

At this point the Senator from Alabama was interrupted by the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], who said:

I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this $26,000,000 building in New York will accommodate only about 500 employees, while the State, War, and Navy Building, which cost one-third that amount, accommodates several thousand employees.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. GLASS. I will ask the Senator to wait for a moment.

This opportune interruption of the Senator from Alabama by the Senator from Georgia, and the fine piece of information conveyed by the latter to the former, was an inspiring contribution to the discussion; and the Senator from Alabama with renewed zest exclaimed:

That is a good point that my friend from Georgia made. The thing gets worse the more you look into it. Five hundred clerks and stenographers and coin carriers in Wall Street, whose god is gold! This building will accommodate 500 people, as against buildings of less cost that accommodate thousands.

Mr. President, it fills me with wonder that Senators seek to discredit the greatest banking institution on earth by giving currency to statements having no more semblance of fact in their justification. I now yield to the Senator from Georgia, in order that he may tell me where he gets sanction for his statement to the Senator from Alabama that the proposed new bank building in New York will accommodate but 500 employees.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I wish to state that in reading the report of the Federal Reserve Board I observed the statement that in this building there were 512 men, as I remember, but afterwards in reading the letter from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, which on yesterday was printed in the RECORD, I ascertained that there are 512 in one building, but there are more than 2,000 in all the buildings. That is how I made the error.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator does not for a moment imagine that I am suggesting intentional misrepresentation on his part? I do not believe he is capable of it; and, for that matter, I do not believe the Senator from Alabama has intended to misrepresent these things; he does not just know anything about them. I do not say that in any spirit of acerbity. It is not remarkable that Senators know little about this complex matter. It is a problem repellent in its very nature, and few men have the patience or the foolhardiness to bother with it; but I say that either Senator might have found simply by reference to the letter of the Federal Reserve Board, written in response to a resolution of the Senate, that the woman's café alone in this building will seat 530 persons; that the men's café alone will seat 530 persons; that the café facilities alone of this new building, designed to give the men and women employees decent accommodations and meals at cost, will take care of 1,060 people, or twice as many as these two Senators gave as the measure of the facilities of the entire bank building. Either of these Senators might have easily ascertained that this bank building is designed and planned to accommodate 5,000 employees, ten times the number they told the Senate and the country it would accommodate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Virginia mean that that number of people are employed in the Federal Reserve Bank of New York?

Mr. GLASS. Will be.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are.

NO "MARBLE PALACE."

Mr. GLASS. I would like to be told by either of the Senators what sanction he has for the statement that this bank building is to cost $26,000,000, and I would like to ask the Senator from Alabama what proof he has that the honorable men selected by the New York banks as their members of the board of directors of the reserve bank are in conspiracy with the honorable members of the Federal Reserve Board in Washington to commit the crime of graft?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the Senator has referred to the two Senators, and, as I am one of those whom he has in mind in making that statement, I desire to say that I read to the Senate yesterday the exact cost of the building as set forth in a letter from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board. The building will cost over $22,000,000, as I remember, and the furnishings will bring the total up to $23,000,000. I think that is accurate.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; the Senator, I am sure, is mistaken, and I think I can show that he has misread the letter of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. President, has the Senate of the United States become a body in which the character of private citizens may thus be assailed without proof of wrongdoing; in which astounding charges may wantonly be directed against public officials who all their lives have enjoyed a reputation as honest men?

Mr. President, I should like to put in the RECORD—I will not weary the Senate by a recital of the figures—statistics showing the unimaginable volume of business transacted by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. That institution, as I indicated a while ago. houses $5,000,000,000 of gold and securities. It moves every working-day in the year an average of $180,000,000 in cash and $1,940,000,000 in securities. Its discounts and advances aggregate $50,000,000,000, and so on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Virginia will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Federal Reserve Bank of New York is the largest bank in the country in resources, in size of its staff, and in daily turnover. It does about one-third of the entire transactions of the Federal reserve system. Its present staff is 36 officers and 2,715 clerks, exclusive of the Buffalo branch. The volume of its operations for 1920 was as follows:

"Discounts and advances, 180,462 items, aggregating $50,539,428,847.

"Acceptances purchased for New York and other Federal reserve banks, 106,237 items, aggregating $2,428,000,000.

"Federal reserve notes and other paper money handled and counted, 558,397,400 pieces, aggregating $2,291,785,688.

"Shipments of currency and coin, 67,405 shipments.

"Checks collected, 87,036,424 items, aggregating $55,325,112,827.

"Notes and drafts collected, 563,814 items, aggregating $1,994,713,245.

"Telegraphic transfers of funds, 147,302 transfers, aggregating $17,021,509,734.

"Balances settled through gold settlement fund, $48,840,900,000.

"United States Government checks and warrants paid, 10,712,243 items, aggregating $2,437,759,148.

"Government bond department transactions, 47,797,417 pieces, aggregating $6,955,101,000.

"Total certificates of indebtedness department transactions, including issues and redemptions, $4,897,841,000.

"Securities handled in custody for United States Treasury and member banks, $100,759,404,785."

The cost of operating departments handling United States Government transactions is about $800,000 per annum, a large part of which used to be paid by the Treasury, but since July 1, 1921, it is all absorbed by the bank.

The bank holds about $5,000,000,000 in cash and securities stored in 11 vaults located in five separate buildings. Some of these vaults do not afford sufficient protection, but no others are available. The average value of cash and securities withdrawn and replaced in the various scattered vaults daily is, cash $180,000,000, securities $1,940,000,000. A daily average of 368 transfers of cash and securities are made through the streets and the corridors of office buildings at great risk of loss.

RELYING ON OLD ESTIMATES.

Mr. GLASS. Now as to the cost of this building: I have here an official statement which shows that Senators have been misled by estimates prepared a year ago, in March, 1921. It was an outside estimate of cost. Some Senators absurdly think that the "estimated" cost of a bank building in New York curtails rural credits in the State of Alabama. The estimated cost in March, 1921, of the building at New York was $17,990,000, from which must be subtracted the price that the bank will receive for its annex building, now being temporarily occupied, and which will be abandoned and sold when the bank goes into the completed building. From this extreme estimate, over a million dollars has been saved on one item and hundreds of thousands of dollars on other items. Over a half-million dollars alone has been saved on the estimated cost of vaults; by the expenditure of $75,000 in expert engineering investigations, half a million dollars was saved by these "grafters" on the board of directors of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

I might detain the Senate by a description of this building which has been spoken of as a "marble palace."

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. CALDER. Just to permit me to say that if the same savings are obtained in the other departments of the building, it will mean that the building will cost less than $13,000,000 instead of $26,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. Precisely.

Now, let us look at this thing relatively. Let us determine the reasonableness of it by contrast.

The bank building of the Illinois Merchants' Trust Co. in Chicago, exclusive of real estate, under contract, is to cost $10,781,000; and if the contract had been let when these estimates of cost were made for the New York building, it is estimated that the cost of this Chicago building for an individual bank, doing not one tithe of the business of this great reserve bank in New York, would have been over $14,000,000.

The cost of the reserve bank at Richmond, measured by the resources of the bank, is less than that of the combined individual bank buildings of Charlotte, N. C., or of Lynchburg, Va., my town, of 40,000 inhabitants.

The New York Federal Reserve Bank, even at this outside estimate per cubic foot, would cost but $1.09, whereas the United States Assay Building just constructed in New York under authorization of the Congress of the United States will cost $2.04 per cubic foot.

The charge to the Government of the architect for the New York Federal Reserve Bank, covering his services for a five-year period with all of his multitude of assistants, was the same as his charge to the Government for the assay building in New York.

Senators know perfectly well that nearly all, if not all, the eminent professional architects of this country belong to the American Institute of Architects. They have a standard charge, and any man who goes below that charge will be turned out of the institute. The New York Reserve Bank paid the standard charge. It could not have gotten a competent architect for any less money. The plans were competitive. While the bank is not to be built in Wall Street, as Senators blatantly declaim, it can not be built in a sage field or a Long Island swamp. It must be located in a business center, and accessible sites in New York cost more than vacant lots in Virginia or Alabama.

The latest estimate of the cost of this building, if the percentage of savings in other items is as great as the savings already made, will be $12,836,000 and not $26,000,000; and the plans show that very little marble will be used in its construction. The description of it as "a marble palace" is mere distortion and in no degree approaches the truth. The construction is very plain, and to my personal knowledge the present New York bank building is frightfully inadequate; any Senator who will go through that enormous establishment and see its congested condition, in rented quarters, with the gold reserves and the securities of the member banks of that great district and of the Government located in five insecure buildings must admit the exigent need of a new building, for of the 3,700 employees 1,200 reacted to tuberculosis tests.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On account of overcrowding?

Mr. GLASS. On account of overcrowding. The business of the bank is being conducted to-day in open and flagrant violation of the health requirements of the State of New York.

WHOSE MONEY IS IT?

Some Senators say, with the best intent on earth, that if this had been the money of the New York bank it would have been a different thing, but it was "the money of the people." So was the money expended by this Illinois bank for a new building derived from the people; and the money to be expended on this New York bank by sanction of Congress itself is no more "the money of the people" than the money to be expended on the Chicago bank. The funds of neither bank belong to "the people" in the sense that they are common property.

Senators should want to be fair. I am sure the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] does. He spoke more of real sense on the pending proposition here yesterday in five minutes than some Senators have spoken on it in five months. Let us see to whom this money belongs.

As previously said, the board recommended to Congress that the reserve bank be permitted to increase their surplus for the express purpose of providing these building facilities. The Congress, as I have said, not only granted the request of the board, but it went much further than the board asked. It is this surplus fund which is being invested in this bank building. To whom does it belong? By act of Congress, by authority of law, it belongs to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, which is owned by the stockholding banks of New York. It is the usufruct of the enterprise, the industry, the thrift, and labor of the business men of that Federal reserve district. If this money were not applied to this purpose it would be invested in some other way. Not a dollar of it could go to Alabama or to Virginia or to any other State. Not a dollar of it could be taken by the people of any other section of the country for any purpose, because the people of no other section contributed a dollar to this fund. It does not affect credits anywhere on earth. It does not withhold from agriculture or commerce or industry or any enterprise one dollar. On the contrary, it gives work to unemployed; it puts money in circulation for materials; it gives a decent, necessary building to house the greatest bank on earth.

Whose money is it?

I will say to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in no event could one dollar of this surplus go into the Treasury of the United States. Even if it were to go there it could not be loaned out; it could not be used to erect public buildings for the Government anywhere; it could not be used to prevent wild mismanagers of banks from committing suicide. It could only be used, under the division of profits provision of the act, to increase the gold reserve behind Treasury notes or to liquidate an inappreciable part of the public debt. What a fiction it is to imagine that rural credits have been restricted by mere estimates of what this great bank building will cost!

A FINAL MISREPRESENTATION.

Mr. President, there is one other item of the speech delivered by the eminent Senator from Alabama which is more or less personal and with which I did not care to have anything to do. It is a quarrel primarily between him and the governor of the Federal Reserve Board. It does not concern me; it does not concern this problem, except that the statement made by the Senator may influence the prejudices, if not the reason, of some Senators here.

On Friday of week before last the Senator said:

W. P. G. Harding voted the Republican ticket in 1920, as I have said here before. Before Senator Warren G. Harding was elected President, he—Gov. Harding—was bowing and smiling like a Democrat, and after Senator Harding was elected President he bowed and smiled like a Republican.

What difference does it make, in the discussion of this question, how Gov. Harding voted? I have a faint idea, recalling the election returns, that a few other Democrats voted the Republican ticket in the last presidential election—a few.

Mr. CARAWAY. And have been ashamed of it ever since.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I would like to leave my friend from Alabama with one accurate statement to sustain his position, but I take leave to read into the RECORD a letter written me on January 7 by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, in which he says:

MY DEAR SENATOR GLASS: I have just read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this morning the remarks made by Senator HEFLIN on the floor of the Senate yesterday concerning me. I feel that it is hardly necessary to assure you that the slurs upon me, stated mildly, are false. I do not claim to be infallible, as far as judgment is concerned, but I do assert that I never made any improper use of my official position. I did not go home to vote in November, 1920, for the reason that I could not spare the time. The election occurred just at the time when the strain on the Federal reserve banks was greatest and I was tied down to my desk arranging interbank rediscounts. * * * I knew that there was not the remotest possibility of my failure to vote having the slightest effect upon the election results in Alabama. * * *

Sincerely, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that under the laws you do not have to go home to vote. You can vote by mail.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; that is true, and thus I am prompted to say that there was one paragraph in this letter from Gov. Harding I purposely omitted to read and did not care to read. I would not now state it but for the provocation offered by the Senator from Alabama. Gov. Harding states in his letter that he was not particularly eager to go home to vote or to send a ballot by mail, because he would have had to vote for the Senator, and he did not want to vote for the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am not surprised at that statement or the statement of the Senator who is defending his record.

Mr. GLASS. I am not defending Gov. Harding's vote or failure to vote. I am not defending anybody's record. I am correcting misconceptions and combating misrepresentations concerning the greatest banking system on earth.

A FARMER ON THE RESERVE BOARD.

With respect to the pending measure, I have no objection to a trained, resourceful farmer on the Federal Reserve Board, and never had any. I myself am a farmer. The original Federal reserve bill as presented by me to the House of Representatives provided that the Secretary of Agriculture should be ex officio a member of the Federal Reserve Board. Were we to eliminate from the galaxy of great statesmen the names of those who tilled the soil there would not be left enough outstanding figures to make us proud of the country. In my own State, for example, we would eliminate George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, John Marshall, Madison, Monroe, and other great men of the farm.

When we provided that the Secretary of Agriculture should, ex officio, be a member of the Federal Reserve Board we had two sound reasons for the requirement. We thought a political element should be introduced into the organization of the system—I do not mean a partisan political element; I use the term in its broad sense. We did not want to erect a financial Frankenstein which might never be reached by the people for correction of evil policies or the arrest of financial tyranny.

We felt also that the Secretary of Agriculture would be a man of exceptional force, acquainted with the requirements of scientific agriculture, and might exercise a wholesome influence in the deliberations of the board.

That was the House bill; but the Senate in its wisdom excluded the Secretary of Agriculture. I think now it might be a good thing to substitute the Secretary of Agriculture on the board for the Comptroller of the Currency. That would preclude the expense of an additional member; but I shall not be intractable about the proposition to increase the membership with a view to getting a farmer on the board.

Frankly, however, I find myself in agreement with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who in his opening remarks said, in effect, that anyone who is simple enough to suppose that this proposed legislation is going to create a revolution in the policies of the Federal reserve banking system—that putting on a farmer is going to bring the millennium to the agricultural interests of the country—will find himself sadly deceived.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. President, I know perfectly well that, compared with the great men from my own State who have adorned high positions in the service of the country, I do not rank as much of a figure in public life; but I fervently thank Heaven that no man may truthfully say I ever misrepresented things to my constituents or practiced the arts of a deceiver. I have tried to render service in the 20 years I have been in Congress. If I have failed, it is my fault; and never shall I undertake to excuse my delinquency by telling the people of Virginia things that are not true about measures upon which I have been called to pass. I try to inform myself and to act with intelligence and composure. I am not afraid of consequences, because I would rather retain my self-respect than to occupy a seat in this or any other body for the balance of the limited time I have to live.

In this connection I may recall that in the comedy by Eupolis, called "The Demi," all the demagogues in hell, one by one, are made to come up and pass in review. At last, when Pericles is named, a character in the play exclaims:

> And here, by way of summary, now we've done,
> Behold, in brief, the heads of all in one!

God knows I would rather in the day of judgment take my place with outcasts than to have any honest person say of me in respect of a vital and pregnant problem of government what was here said of this Athenian palterer. Any Senator who discovers his own likeness in the picture is at liberty to appropriate the analogy.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, we have listened at some length to one of the reputed authors of the Federal reserve banking system. I want to state in the outset that I have never criticized that system. On the contrary, I have always said that the system was a splendid one. I helped to pass the measure that brought it into being. It is the product of the genius of former Secretary of the Treasury William Gibbs McAdoo, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and other Senators on this side.

I am a firm friend of the system. I have criticized and condemned the perversion of it from the ends of its institution, and I shall continue to do so. The Federal Reserve Board has been maladministered since the spring of 1920. I repeat in the presence of the distinguished Senator from Virginia that the Federal Reserve Board's deflation policy was a murderous policy, and I hope in the brief time that I shall speak to-day to call attention to some things that will sustain that contention.

I could not quite understand the strange and premeditated attack made upon me by the Senator from Virginia. He read his statements from the pages of a prepared speech, and therefore made the attacks deliberately. I wonder what man or set of men prevailed upon the Senator to make such a speech.

Mr. President, many of the things that the Senator from Virginia said regarding me sounded as if they emanated from one W. P. Harding, governor of the Federal Reserve Board. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has the unique distinction of being the only Senator from the South who will defend the Federal Reserve Board's destructive deflation policy. There is not a single Senator here from an agricultural State in the West who will indorse and approve, as does the Senator from Virginia, the deadly deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. The men to whom I refer believe in a fair deal for the agricultural and live-stock industry. They are men who could not be induced to approve a deflation policy that has produced dire distress and financial disaster among the farmers and cattlemen of the South and West.

I want to read a line from the hearings before the Joint Committee on Agriculture of the House and Senate in December, 1920. The Federal reserve bank at Richmond issued an order saying that the thing to do was to deflate as rapidly as possible. Representative BYRNES, of South Carolina—than whom the farmers have never had a better friend—questioned Gov. Harding before that board, and said, in substance, "Governor, does not your board sanction these orders?" Gov. Harding undertook to evade and dodge. He said: "Why, they frequently issue the orders before we know about it." I whispered to Mr. BYRNES: "Ask him if the Federal Reserve Board does not approve them before they become official," and Gov. Harding answered in the affirmative. "Then the board is responsible for and must sanction these orders before they become effective and official?" "Yes, sir."

What more do you want in the way of proof that they instituted a deflation policy?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. The bank at Richmond said that the thing to do was to bring it about as quickly as possible, and the governor of the Federal Reserve Board admitted that the board had to approve all the orders fixing the policies of the system; and that is what I am complaining about—the deadly, murderous deflation policy that denied men money with which to carry on their business; that drove men mad; that made them commit suicide. There are many of them dead to-day, men who were driven to take their own lives because of the deflation policy that the Senator from Virginia has defended for more than three hours in this body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator for a brief statement. I do not want to yield for a speech. He has spoken for three or four hours.

Mr. GLASS. I have made one speech to the Senate in two years. I should be perfectly willing to contrast that with the record of the Senator from Alabama, who has made 40 speeches in 2 weeks. If the Senator does not want to be interrupted, I shall not interrupt him. I yielded to him.

Mr. HEFLIN. All the speeches that I have made have been on the side of the people. The Senator yielded to me once or twice briefly, and I said I did not want to interrupt him, because I was going to reply to his speech. I am going to make another speech. I am not going to speak now more than 25 or 30 minutes. I want to yield the floor to some other Senators who desire to speak. I am going to reply to the Senator's speech at length very soon. If he had given me notice that he was going to make the character of speech that he has made, I would have been ready to reply to-day at length.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield briefly to the Senator for an interruption.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I merely wanted to suggest to the Senator from Alabama that if the Federal reserve bank at Richmond issued an order of deflation, the Senator can very easily establish the fact that that order was carried out if he will give to the Senate figures showing that deflation took place under that order. I have given to the Senate figures showing that so far from the Richmond Federal Reserve Bank having deflated its credits and currency, it increased them $20,000,000 during the period of falling prices.

Mr. HEFLIN. I dispute the figures of the Senator from Virginia; and I will quote against him, in time, figures from the former Comptroller of the Currency, another Virginian, who has dared to fight the Wall Street money power and expose the infamous deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. It is time for plain talk.

The Senator from Virginia has in his inspired attack upon me invited plain talk, and I always try to accommodate gentlemen under such circumstances.

Now, Mr. President, let me read a little further from a bulletin or order from the Richmond bank:

> It is a recognized function of the Federal reserve banking system to exercise control over the volume of credit and currency.

Here they claim to have control over the amount of money and credits in the United States. Listen to that again, Senators:

> It is a recognized function of the Federal reserve banking system to exercise control over the volume of credit and currency.

That is what we have been discussing, and I charge that in their efforts to bring about deflation they contracted the currency, deflated credits, and literally murdered the business of the South and the West. The Federal Reserve Board is responsible for that policy. The Richmond bank was but doing what the Federal Reserve Board wanted done. This is from the same bank and doubtless another inspired order from the Federal Reserve Board:

It is recognized to be unsafe to go further with commodity prices at such a dangerous height.

What did they mean by that statement? Did they not intend to beat down the price of wheat, and beat down the price of corn, and beat down the price of cattle, and beat down the price of cotton? What else could they mean? Here they are talking about doing the very thing they did do later, contracting the currency and deflating or denying the credits needed.

If all the banks in this district will earnestly and conscientiously endeavor to limit credits—

And so forth.

This is a part of another order or bulletin indorsed by the Federal Reserve Board, which now denies that it tried to deflate credits.

Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate now to go through this document from which I read, but I wish to say in passing that the trail of the deflation serpent is over it all.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has a very touchy disposition with regard to this Federal reserve system. He acts as though it were his individual offspring and private personal property. It angers him for anyone to dare to criticize even the foolish and dangerous administration of it. The Senator from Virginia is magnificent, he is wonderful, in certain lines. The Senator has never been very much in close touch and sympathy with the masses of the people. He is a scholarly man, a great student of books. He is good on theoretical things, but I fear he lacks the common touch that Kipling speaks of, and his speech has convinced me that the distress and suffering of the people of the South and West have failed utterly to arouse his sympathy. When I heard him say in his speech that the Federal Reserve Board's policy had saved agriculture in the South and West I said, "God grant us deliverance from such a plan of salvation." Mr. President, it was not salvation; it was ruination and damnation of the worst kind. Here is what they did—just what this bank says. They sent them this as a starter:

If all the banks in this district will earnestly and conscientiously endeavor to limit credits—

Mr. President, they started this thing, and it ran away with them, and business suffered on every hand as a result of it. The power that inspired and started it intended to profit by the distress and misfortune of millions of people.

The Senator says:

I undertake to show to the Senate that there was no discrimination against agriculture.

Well, let us see whether there was or not. Let me read you a telegram just received:

RICHMOND, VA., January 17, 1922.

Hon. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In proof of the charges of favoritism toward New York City banks and gross discrimination against the country districts by Federal reserve, I ask your attention to the following established facts:

(1) In January, 1920, records show that one big speculative institution in New York City received from reserve system twice as much money as the system was lending at that time on agricultural and live-stock paper to all the 9,000 member banks in all of our 48 States.

(2) That as late as February, 1921, the reserve system was lending to one bank in New York City three times as much money as eight Federal reserve banks were at that time lending on agricultural and live-stock paper at all their member banks in 28 States and parts of 5 other States, covering about two-thirds of the entire country.

(3) In the autumn of 1920 national banks in New York City were borrowing in proportion to their total loans and discounts three times as much from the Federal reserve system as all the 7,600 country national banks in the entire United States were borrowing at that time.

(4) The actual contraction or reduction in accommodations granted by all 12 Federal reserve banks from October, 1920, when Members of Congress, farmers, and business men were imploring the Reserve Board to relax their pressure, to November, 1921, amounted actually to about $1,800,000,000.

Other abundant evidence of discrimination and favoritism can be furnished if they are needed.

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS.

There is a complete answer in a few words to the speech of the Senator from Virginia by a big, brave, and able Virginian who deserves the praise and gratitude of all the American people for the great service he has rendered and is still rendering. Oh, Mr. President, the spectacle which we have witnessed here to-day is a strange and curious one. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] seemed to take delight in attacking me personally while the enemy of agriculture, the boss of the Federal Reserve Board, Gov. Harding, smiled his approval down upon him from the gallery. I could not help feeling that he was trying to please the head of the Federal Reserve Board.

If I know my own heart, I am trying to do my duty so that the people whose Government this is will feel that I am faithful to the oath that I took when I came here as United States Senator.

The Senator said on yesterday, "We have no central banking system; it is a regional system." Certainly; but, Mr. President, they have converted it into a central system, and it is now operating exactly as Wall Street wants it to operate, and Wall Street favors it as it now operates.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], a Republican, is chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and he and the Senator from Virginia are in exact accord; both of them indorse the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. The Senator bitterly opposed and tried to kill the Federal reserve banking system when the bill creating it was up in this body, and yet on yesterday, when the Senator from Virginia assailed me and those from the South and West who had dared to fight the control of the money supply and credit of the country by the money lords of Wall Street, the Senator from Connecticut came over and whispered words of sweet commendation and entire approval into the eager, listening ears of the Senator from Virginia. Aye, and that is not all, Mr. President. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who lives not a great distance from Wall Street, came over and offered his felicitations. This will give you an idea of the interests that condemn my position and approve the position of the Senator from Virginia. When I am taking a position that certain greedy and selfish interests of the East oppose, I know I am right, and right is right, as God is God.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] who sits before me, a genuine friend of the farmer, remembers that when we had Gov. Harding before the Joint Committee on Agriculture, he dodged and evaded. The Senator himself tried to bring out answers to questions a number of times, and Gov. Harding slipped and slided in every way that he could to keep from giving a frank answer to the questions asked, and finally when Congressman BYRNES, of South Carolina, one of the ablest and best Representatives who have come from the South while I have been in Congress—a fearless and brilliant young statesman—questioned him, and the Senator from Nebraska was presiding, Gov. Harding seemed to get excited, and to the surprise of everybody present said, in substance, "What are you trying to do? Am I on trial?" And the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who are present here to-day, and others, told him that there was nothing improper in the question and to go ahead and answer it. He became angry. Senators, is that the way for a big, clean-handed and level-headed man to act; a man who was being called upon to tell the lawmakers of the Nation the truth and the whole truth about a matter that vitally affected the whole American people? What was he doing that for? Was he trying to get away from those inquiries? I think so. The Senator from Virginia is in close touch with the governor of the Federal Reserve Board. He wields such influence over him that he was able to make him quit his desk during the time he was carrying on his deadly deflation policy and go out of the office and get some fresh air. I submit to the Senate and to the country it would have been better for the farmers and all the people of the South and West if the Senator from Virginia had kept him out in the fresh air all the time. I hold that a man who carries out a policy that will make men kill themselves is himself guilty of the crime of murder.

The Senator from Virginia has taken it upon himself to assail me for resenting the injury done to the people of my State by Gov. Harding and the Federal Reserve Board. This man Harding is from my State and I would rather defend him than criticize and condemn him. If it were not for the awful and fatal record he has made I would delight to stand here and defend him; but I do not care from whence a man comes, and whether he is a Democrat or Republican; whenever a man betrays a public trust and uses the power placed in his hands to inflict injury upon the masses of the people, I am going to cry out against it.

The Senator from Virginia said I spoke frequently and that he speaks seldom. It is necessary for somebody to speak frequently under conditions that have been and are now upon us. One day some weeks ago I quoted a few lines that went like this:

Keeping quiet when we should talk
Makes cowards out of men.

Never in the days of President Jackson and Thomas H. Benton was the money power so completely lodged in the hands of greedy Wall Street financiers as it is to-day under the management of the present Federal Reserve Board.

They can not—they dare not—dispute the facts in John Skelton Williams's telegram. I take his statement against them all. I know that no special interest, that no sinister influence, can reach him. He is a big, brave, and brainy man. He is a Virginian who has the ability and disposition to live up to the best traditions of his great Commonwealth. But for him we would never have known about all of this crookedness and subserviency of the Federal Reserve Board.

Yesterday I heard the Senator from Virginia reading about how the silk industry of Japan broke down. Gov. Harding has already said the same lame things in his interviews and speeches, and how a little sugar concern in Cuba had financial troubles, and that that caused our Federal reserve system to stand with fear and trembling—a system that had defied the combined powers of military autocracy; financed the World War; floated $20,000,000,000 of bonds; loaned $10,000,000,000 to the Allies; and then came home, stalwart, strong, still boasting of her strength; and when she saw the little silk industry of little Japan totter she commenced to cringe with fear, and when she saw the sugar industry of Cuba trembling she, too, trembled here. Such a charge against that system is unwarranted. It is untrue. This whole thing was caused by the Federal Reserve Board's dangerous and deadly deflation policy. The Federal Reserve Board wanted something or somebody to place the blame on, and it laid it on a little silk industry in Japan and a little sick sugar concern down in Cuba.

No Member of Congress was deceived by those false reports. They all knew that the banking system that had financed the World War could finance this country in time of peace. That deflation policy was a crime against the legitimate business of the country. Do you know why we revived the War Finance Board? We revived it purely and wholly because the Federal reserve banking system, under the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board, was not functioning properly. The Federal Reserve Board favored putting the War Finance Corporation out of business. If the Federal reserve system had functioned as it did before these men got to truckling to hold their jobs, and listening to the siren whispers of Wall Street, we would not have had the hard times that have so sorely afflicted our people. Let me read you a statement from a banker in New Jersey, an ex-governor of the Commonwealth of that State:

EDITOR MANUFACTURERS' RECORD:

In reply to your communication, in which you quote a remark of mine, to the effect that "much of the business depression is due to destructive liquidation forced by the controlling banking element," and asking me for a letter thereon, I beg leave to say:

When the Federal Reserve Board announced its policy of curtailed credit and of deflation, confidence was impaired and the natural inclination was to sell. Where everybody was selling, naturally nobody was buying, and as a consequence prices declined as rapidly in six months as they did in six years after the Civil War.

Think of that, Senators. Does not that look like we had deflation with a vengeance? The Federal Reserve Board deflated more in six months following the World War than was permitted in the six years following the war of 1860.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend, briefly.

Mr. DIAL. I rather think the Senator is wrong in stating that the Federal Reserve Board wanted the War Finance Corporation put out of existence. I know, as a matter of fact—I want to say in justice to everybody—that some members of that board did not want it put out of existence.

Mr. HEFLIN. The governor of the board appeared before our committee against it, as did the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Houston.

Mr. DIAL. I know that some members of the board did try very hard to keep that organization in existence. John Skelton Williams was one, and there were other members of the board, too. I will not take up the time to go into that.

Mr. HEFLIN. The governor of the board, Mr. Harding, was in favor of putting it out of commission, and it was put out of commission. No member of the Federal Reserve Board appeared before our committee to render us assistance in reviving the War Finance Board.

The Comptroller of the Currency, John Skelton Williams, in a letter under date of December 28, 1920, to the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Gov. Harding, estimated the shrinkage in values somewhere between twelve and eighteen billions of dollars. Think of that, Senators!

Are you not astounded at those figures? But the Senator from Virginia talks about men who stand here and undertake to defend the rights of the southern people and the western people, the farmers and the cattlemen, and he refers to them as demagogues. How shall we refer to such critics—as the tools and handy instruments of Wall Street? Who is it that inspires this attack upon men who dare to stand here and speak for what they know is right? No man in this body or out of it can make such insinuations against me without having plain and pointed talk given to him.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield briefly to the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, in my speech I referred to an ex-governor of New Jersey who severely assailed the policy of the Secretary of the Treasury in continuing a money committee in New York to keep down the interest charges on commercial, agricultural, and industrial paper to 6 per cent, and who declared that money was worth what money would bring in competitive markets. I now state that that gentleman who wanted money to bring what it was worth was Gov. Stokes, from whom the Senator is reading.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am quoting Gov. Stokes on another proposition, going to the main evil of the deflation policy.

Or, as he puts it, I read from Gov. Stokes:

Property values in this country, which have apparently melted away in the last 12 months (prior to December 28, 1920), represent a sum far greater than the total gold supply of the world at this time.

Yet the Senator is astounded that men on this floor will challenge such an infamous policy as that which brought this condition about.

This caused a tremendous cancellation of orders—

Says Gov. Stokes. Listen to that, you Senators representing eastern manufacturers—and the protesting of foreign bills of exchange against shipments while the latter were deteriorating in foreign harbors. The demoralization which grew out of this hasty, forced liquidation not only checked the wheels of industry but it piled up frozen credits in banks and caused a tremendous loss to these institutions. Thus the movement at its very inception defeated its object. It didn't liquidate at all; it simply froze. It did more. It stopped business employment and wages.

The Senator from Virginia referred to the woolen business of 1920 on yesterday. Listen to this—I read from Gov. Stokes:

The American Woolen Co., in a nation-wide full-page advertisement, stated that when the banking elements, through the Federal Reserve Board, gave notice of curtailment of credit and deflation, cancellation of orders poured in, their mills were necessarily stopped, and men thrown out of employment.

That is the deadly, destructive work that lies in the trail of the Federal Reserve Board's deflation policy. Further, the governor says:

An instance under my personal observation: The proprietor of a woolen mill that had operated continuously since its inception, mostly day and night shifts, as soon as he read the announcement, came to my desk and said: "This is extremely unfortunate and will result in business paralysis."

Business men realized that this action on the part of the Federal Reserve Board meant ruin to legitimate business.

But the Senator from Virginia says, "Where is the proof and where are they who cry out against this policy of the Federal Reserve Board?" Here is a banker and an ex-governor of his State telling what the deadly effect of this thing was upon the woolen business mentioned by the Senator from Virginia. I read further from the governor:

In a few days he had a million dollars' worth of orders canceled on him, and his mill stopped operating for the first time in its history.

Then the Senator from Virginia is surprised that a man will get up here and dare to criticize the Federal Reserve Board's policy and insinuates that those who do so are demagogues. If they are, God grant that their tribe may increase in this body. If they are demagogues, what are those who plead for the protection and perpetuity of such a policy but the tools and agents of Wall Street?

I read further:

These are only illustrations of the natural result that follows from banking interests interfering in functions outside of their proper jurisdiction. The banker has a right to say to the applicant, "You may have no more credit." He has no right to say to him out loud, so the whole country can hear and be frightened, "You have got to sell your goods."

And that is the policy that I am objecting to. They struck down the cotton producers; they clubbed the grain producers; and they robbed the cattlemen, and they did not deflate retail prices to the consumer. Why? One day during that time cotton was selling at 9 cents a pound, and I paid 25 cents that very day for a cotton collar. At that rate, a bale of cotton made into collars would bring more than $1,000, but the farmer received only $45 for it. Talk about deflating? Gov. Stokes is right. Again he said:

It did not deflate all along the line; this was the unfairness of the proposition and the cause of industrial depression. It was utterly unfair to the producer, the farmer, and the manufacturer or the merchant that they should deflate their product, unless they were guaranteed a deflation all along the line.

Were we not entitled to ask that the same deflation policy imposed upon us should be imposed against everybody? What happened? The farmer and the man and woman of moderate means were forced to sell their Liberty bonds under that drastic deflation policy. They sold them for $85 on the $100. Down and down and down they went. Where are they now? They are out of the hands of the small bondholders and climbing up in price on Wall Street. The money kings of the country bought them, as the Federal Reserve Board's policy forced them out of the hands of the small bondholders of the country.

What else did Gov. Stokes say?

> It may have a right to extend or refuse to extend credit. There their functions cease, but even if it is contended that the banks have this right, the method of enforcing it was most unhappy. It was founded upon the theory that the way to restrict credits is to raise interest or credit rates.

There is where they waylaid and struck business down. Oh, Mr. President, in the heyday of the system when the rediscount rate was 3 per cent, honest business could acquire all the money that it needed by going to a member bank or an outside bank going to a member bank and rediscounting its paper, going home with its money, and serving the financial needs of the locality, and everything moved smoothly. But when they raised the rediscount rate to 7 per cent, the legal rate in my State was 8 per cent, just 1 per cent higher than the rediscount rate, and that one act of the Federal Reserve Board prevented many, many loans in my State. It made the margin of profit so small in the interest allowed in my State that the board prevented people who needed money from getting it. Not only that, but the local banker could not get it from the Federal reserve banking system in the agricultural sections of the country.

A man sick and suffering needs a doctor to come to his rescue. His life is at stake. They say the doctors' fees have gone up by leaps and bounds. They are very high. He says, "I did not need the doctor when I was well. I need him now very badly, for I am sick, and the fees are so high that I can not pay him and he will not come because he knows I can not pay him." That is the attitude in which the Federal Reserve Board puts the farmer and banker in the agricultural sections of the South and West.

Gov. Stokes said, further:

> Could any principle be more absurd or more vicious? And yet that is practically the banking policy that prevails to-day in regard to the restriction of credit. There is not the slightest excuse for raising interest rates in order to restrict credit; not the slightest justification.

This last statement is in contradiction of the statement of the Senator from Virginia, that the governor of New Jersey wanted the interest rate to go as high as it pleased.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should like to relate briefly a little incident that I think may be informing to the Senator from Virginia and also to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. For the last 40 years I have been doing business, either personally or through a little State bank of which I am the president, with the Georgia Railroad Bank, one of the finest institutions in the South, as many Senators here know. It has never been difficult for me to get money from that bank, either for myself or for the McDuffie Bank, a State institution of which I am president.

At the time the papers were carrying statements that the Federal Reserve Board had declared that farm paper must be called in and no further credit extended on farm paper the McDuffie Bank was carrying $70,000 of farm paper, and we wanted to get some money for the benefit of our customers and the benefit of the bank. We made the application as usual to the Georgia Railroad Bank, and we were told in reply that the bank would lend to the bank on the personal indorsement of the directors, but it would not lend to the McDuffie Bank on any farm paper whatever. Then the bank at my instance made application to a well-known bank in New York, which is not a member of the Federal reserve system, and we obtained the money at once.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I yield briefly.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] will obtain and put in the RECORD any order issued by the Federal Reserve Board or any Federal reserve bank to decline to grant credits on farm paper, I should be infinitely obliged to him. If he will do that or if he can do that there will be some point to the episode which he has related.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I did not say that I could produce a bulletin from the Federal Reserve Board. I did state, however, and am prepared to prove, that announcement was made in the papers that this policy of deflation had been adopted, and that immediately thereafter the Georgia Railroad Bank, after having loaned to the McDuffie Bank for the last 14 years on farm paper, declined to lend in response to this application, but would lend on the personal indorsement of myself and the other directors.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that no such order ever emanated from the Federal Reserve Board or from any Federal reserve bank, and any newspaper publication to that effect was totally inaccurate. The Senator was not present when I showed that bank after bank would say to a customer to whom it did not care to loan money that the Federal reserve bank would not rediscount the paper, when the Federal reserve bank would have rediscounted the paper.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I will accept what the local nonmember banks and the member banks said about being forced to refuse loans or to call loans. The Federal Reserve Board is still trying to cover up its tracks and hide its part in this great crime.

The case cited by the Senator from Georgia could be multiplied hundreds of times in the cotton belt alone. The Federal Reserve Board have browbeaten banks, and they have intimidated banks in a quiet way until they are afraid to speak out against the dangerous policy of this tyrannical board. I know of a Senator in this body now who has a long letter from a banker telling him how this thing has worked and begging him not to use his name. Senators, are the legitimate banking institutions of this country to be humiliated and hampered by this bold and brazen board?

I repeat, the sooner the President of the United States can remove this discredited Federal Reserve Board the sooner he will greatly gratify a hundred millions of people.

I yield to the Senator from South Carolina for a question.

Mr. DIAL. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Georgia whether the bank to which he referred a while ago, the McDuffie Bank, is a member of the system?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. DIAL. Why do they not join it? They then could borrow money.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Because the McDuffie Bank likes to be independent.

Mr. HEFLIN. They do not have to join in order to get money. This system loans money to a bank outside. A member bank will loan to a local bank that is not in the system. A member bank, however, charged one bank in my State that I know about 8 per cent. That was charged by a member bank in Atlanta. The rediscount rate is now, I believe, 5 per cent, and the legal rate is 8 per cent in my State. And yet the Senator from Virginia talks about extending aid to the farmers. It is either willful deception or pitiful ignorance, I do not know which.

I wish to complete this quotation from Gov. Stokes. He said:

> The way to restrict credit is to refuse to extend it, instead of charging 8 or 10 or 20 per cent. The latter burdens the country with an unnecessarily high credit cost, always a handicap on business and enterprise.
> Credit can be restricted by the banks with the rediscount rate at 4 per cent just as readily as it can be with the rediscount rate at 8 per cent or higher, and if the present banking fraternity can not restrict credit by refusing to grant it, their Macedonian cry to high-interest rates to come to their rescue is a confession of incompetency.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator for a brief statement.

Mr. GLASS. Can not the Senator see from Gov. Stokes's own statement that Gov. Stokes favored the individual banks restricting credit by refusing to grant credit?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; but not by putting up the rediscount rate.

Mr. GLASS. What is the difference?

Mr. HEFLIN. He wanted to be honest and just tell the man, "I will not lend you any more money."

Mr. GLASS. Exactly; and that is what the Senator from Alabama complained about.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am complaining about the raising of the rediscount rate for the purpose of preventing loans. The Federal Reserve Board came up and said at the very time the people needed money most the interest or rediscount rate is raised from 3 to 7 per cent. That was a terrible and a murderous blow to the agricultural sections of the country.

In other words, the Federal Reserve Board used a system or an instrument created for the purpose of saving business in the time of need to strike down and destroy legitimate business.

Mr. GLASS. Will the Senator be kind enough to enlighten me, if not the balance of the Senate, by stating and putting in the RECORD when the rediscount rate of any Federal reserve bank was 3 per cent?

Mr. HEFLIN. It was that before they raised it.

Mr. GLASS. It never was 3 per cent in any bank.

Mr. HEFLIN. What was it?

Mr. GLASS. From 4¼ to 4½ or 4¾ or 5 per cent. It never was 3 per cent.

Mr. HEFLIN. I beg to differ with the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. It never was, at least so far as I know. The Senator may know.

Mr. HEFLIN. It was 3 per cent at some of the Federal reserve banks. I want to call the attention of the Senator again to what he said, that no discrimination had been shown against agriculture. They charged 4½ per cent rediscount rate in New York, 5½ per cent in the cotton belt, and 5½ and 6 per cent in the grain belt, and as high as 20, 30, and 87½ per cent in the agricultural sections. I think now they have reduced the rate to 5 per cent at the Atlanta bank, and they charge us 5 per cent in our distress, while they let the gamblers in Wall Street have money at 4½ per cent.

Mr. GLASS. I will state to the Senator from Alabama, if he will permit me, that the rediscount rate at the New York bank was raised on June 1, 1920, while it was raised at the Atlanta bank, which ministers to the wants of Alabama, on the following November 17, 1920.

Mr. HEFLIN. They failed to let us have needed money down there long before that. Yes, Mr. President, they raised the rediscount rate in Wall Street in New York, and then what happened? With this club in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, seeing the storm coming, money sought the center of Wall Street and went there where a high interest rate could be obtained. Call money ranged from 12 per cent to 20 per cent and 30 per cent and as high as 200 per cent. Of course, it would go out of the little places in the country to where the speculative interests would pay the highest rate of interest.

Again I say that that deflation policy was a destructive one and constituted a crime against the country. It drained the country of its idle cash. That is another fruit of this policy of the Federal Reserve Board, and "by their fruits ye shall know them."

Mr. GLASS. But the Senator was proceeding to say that the rediscount rate of the Federal reserve banks was first raised in his territory against the farmers and last in Wall Street.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all.

Mr. GLASS. Whereas just the reverse of that is the fact.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Virginia did not understand me at all. I never said what he has stated. I said they charged 4 per cent and 4½ per cent in New York and charged 5 per cent and 5½ per cent in my section of the country. If that is not discrimination, then I am no judge of what the English language means. I say that in due deference to my theoretical and scholarly friend, the Senator from Virginia, who takes occasion to defend the inexcusable and indefensible deflation record of Gov. Harding and his board.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a brief statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. Gov. McCall, in an article some time ago—and I can furnish the article if it is desired—stated the fact, which, I take it, can not be questioned, that—

> During the year prior to the close of September, 1921, there had been a contraction in the currency notes of about $800,000,000, and in the total bills, meaning Government bills and rediscounts of the banks, there had been a shrinkage of nearly $1,700,000,000, or more than half of the total amount.

Then he says:

> The result was chiefly effected by the autocratic enforcement of high interest rates against the banks upon their rediscounts, and this was reflected by still higher rates charged their customers by the banks.

Mr. HEFLIN. That sustains my contention, Mr. President.

Mr. GLASS. May I inquire who makes that statement?

Mr. FLETCHER. Ex-Gov. McCall, of Massachusetts.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, the figures of the banks themselves show that for that period the expansion was nearly a billion dollars and that there was no deflation.

Mr. FLETCHER. The question in my mind is, since the power exists in the Federal Reserve Board to limit circulation and to limit the note issue by raising the rate on rediscounts, whether it would not be proper and wise so to amend the act as to require some sort of notice to be given and some sort of hearing to be had before they autocratically and without any notice whatever raise such rates.

Mr. HEFLIN. I agree with my friend from Florida. That should be done. Ex-Gov. McCall is right. We know that needed credits were denied and that certain interests profited by the distress produced.

Mr. GLASS. That is a question of operation. What I am pointing out to the Senator from Florida is that the figures which he has read must necessarily be inaccurate unless the official, authenticated figures given by 12 Federal reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board are inaccurate, for their official figures show that for the very period mentioned by the Senator from Florida the increase in credits and currency approximated a billion dollars.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida hits the nail squarely on the head. The shrinkage or contraction, the drawing in of the money which had been serving the needs of the people or the refusal to supply it in sufficient amounts caused distress and failure in business. There must be water to turn the wheels of a mill, and if the water is shut off the mill stops. That is what happened under the murderous deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend from South Carolina. A better friend the farmers of the South have never had in this body.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I went to headquarters before coming to the Senate this morning and asked the Comptroller of the Currency to ascertain directly and officially from the Federal Reserve Board and elsewhere just what are the actual facts in reference to this matter. One of the questions I propounded was as to the actual amounts discounted for member banks by each of the 12 reserve banks for the years 1920 and 1921, and the total for the fiscal year. I will merely read one or two of the answers. It is shown that in 1919 the New York Federal Reserve Bank rediscounted $788,194,000; in 1921 they rediscounted $213,000,000. In 1919 the Richmond Federal Reserve Bank rediscounted for member banks $108,661,000, and for the year ended December 28, 1921, rediscounted $94,426,000, a shrinkage of discounted paper of something like $20,000,000. The Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank seems to have increased its rediscounts, which were $90,000,000 in 1919 and $94,000,000 in 1921.

If the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I shall take Chicago, the center of the great stock industry. In 1919 the Chicago Federal Reserve Bank rediscounted $260,599,000, and during the year ended December 28, 1921, $196,000,000. The Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank, which is located at another stock center, rediscounted $100,433,000 in 1919 and $67,717,000 in 1921. The Federal reserve bank at Dallas seems to have increased its rediscounts. I call the attention of the Senate to these figures, including the total for all the 12 Federal reserve banks, which I will now give: In 1919 they held rediscounted paper for member banks to the amount of $2,194,878,000, whereas on December 20, 1921, they held $1,179,833,000, a shrinkage of a little over a billion dollars in that time.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is another piece of testimony sustaining my contention. Mr. President, we did not need any credits in 1919. Cotton was moving freely and selling for 40 cents a pound, and it is unfair to compare credits granted in 1919, when we did not need them, with 1920, when we did need them.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that the figures presented by me in my remarks were furnished me by the Federal Reserve Board and are the official figures for the various Federal reserve districts.

Mr. SMITH. I will state, Mr. President, that the figures I have quoted were brought to me by a clerk from the comptroller's office this morning, and were furnished by the reserve board. The figures embraced in the table I have are official figures, and I should like in my own time, Mr. President, to place them in the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I thank my friend from South Carolina for the suggestion which he has made and for the figures he has given. They are in line with the suggestions and figures of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. Those two Senators know how the people of the South have suffered and are suffering now. I want to state for the benefit of the Senator from Virginia just how this deflation policy affected the individual farmer in my State. The farmer with 10 bales of cotton at 40 cents a pound had $2,000 worth of cotton. Under the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board the price of that cotton was decreased by July, 1921, to an average price of $45 a bale, or $450 for the 10 bales, so that three-fourths of the value of the farmer's cotton crop was destroyed in 12 months, and the price was forced down and down, far below the cost of production—a loss of $1,550 to one farmer on 10 bales of cotton. Does the Senator from Virginia, whose State produces practically no cotton, quarrel with me for fighting to relieve my people from the cruel bondage of such a board? Whether he does or not makes but little difference with me, for I propose to continue to fight for what I believe is right in this body. Whether men are influenced by suggestions from Wall Street or elsewhere, I do not know, but I am getting weary of the charge that Senators are demagogues because they dare to stand in this body and plead for justice to the masses of millions in distress at this very hour in the South and West because of the deflation policy inaugurated by Gov. Harding and his Federal Reserve Board—Gov. Harding, who smiled down from the gallery upon the head of the Virginia Senator [Mr. GLASS] as he undertook the impossible task of defending the indefensible deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board.

The Senator from Virginia read from a letter of Gov. Harding the statement that one reason he did not go home to vote was that he did not want to vote for me. I was the Democratic nominee for the Senate, and if he had been a good Democrat he would have wanted to vote for me.

Gov. Harding, in the letter to the Senator from Virginia, does not deny the charge that he supported the Republican ticket in the national election of 1920. Here is the editorial of the Washington Times, April 12, 1921:

> Although Gov. Harding is a Wilson appointee, he did everything consistent with his office to further the Republican cause at the last election. This attitude has dispelled prejudice arising out of the fact that he was inducted into public life under Democratic auspices.

There it is, and the governor of the Federal Reserve Board has never denied it.

The service that he rendered the Republican Party through his deadly deflation policy cost the Democratic Party hundreds of thousands of votes. He did what the Republicans wanted done, and they are retaining him in office because he has been their obedient servant. The deflation policy that he carried out and his retention in office have cost the American people billions of dollars.

I condemn and repudiate the deflation policy of Gov. Harding and his board. I say to the Senate again that a Federal Reserve Board that, in times like these, will sanction the erection of a bank building in New York involving the expenditure and handling by certain people of $20,000,000 is covered all over with the suspicion of graft. That is my opinion stated again, and I am responsible for my statements here and elsewhere.

Mr. President, a board that will inaugurate a deflation policy, as the Federal Reserve Board did, and carry it out over the protests of the South and West, as the Federal Reserve Board did, is not worthy of the confidence of the people; and when at the same time it orders or permits a bank building constructed in New York at a cost of eighteen or twenty million dollars, which is more money than the Capitol, the Senate Office Building, the House Office Building, and the State, War, and Navy Building combined cost, am I to be told that there is no graft in it? It is time to talk plainly. If some little hickory-nut headed agent had started anything like that, it would have been said that he intended to steal something. Why not talk plainly about crooks higher up. The country is in no humor to fool with these men. I make bold to suggest that it smacks of graft.

The Senator from Virginia undertakes to whitewash this man who wanted to deny to southern Senators an audience in the fall of 1920. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] called on him with a delegation, but Gov. Harding, of the board, said that he did not have time to listen, and an effort was made to switch off the Senator; but the Senator said, "You will hear me," and he forced the governor to assemble the board. That is the man I am talking against, Gov. Harding.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the governor of the board said that he had heard enough—that is, the truth about it—and I went before the full board and secured an audience.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from North Carolina secured an audience anyhow, in spite of the statement of the governor of the board, who was hostile to him and to the southern interests. The same thing applies to the West.

Let me show what happened to the farmers in my State, from which Gov. Harding also comes. The farmers of Alabama made 660,000 bales of cotton in 1920; at 40 cents a pound, or $200 a bale, they would have received $132,000,000 for their crop. Under the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board, however, the price was reduced to 9 cents a pound, or to $45 a bale, so that the return from the whole crop was only $29,000,000, representing a loss to the farmers of my State alone in 12 months' time of $102,300,000. Then the Senator from Virginia wonders that I dare arraign and indict the Federal Reserve Board. I do indict it, and the Senator from Virginia can say that it is pitiful ignorance or what he pleases, but that does not deter me. I have been fighting for common honesty and plain justice in public affairs all my life. There are some Senators who do that; there are Senators who break their silence and dare plead for the people, who do not reserve themselves and preserve their strength to fight the battles of the money power in a pinch.

In November, 1920, right in the heart of the crop-moving season, the Federal reserve banks were lending to two banks in New York City, conspicuous for their speculative activities, $250,000,000. During the same month in 1920 the entire amount loaned by six Federal reserve banks on "agricultural" and "live-stock" paper in 18 States was only $15,642,000. So the two banks in New York were borrowing from the Federal reserve banks $234,358,000 more than all the agricultural interests and live-stock interests of 18 States in the Union were able to obtain. The amount being loaned to the agricultural and live-stock interests in those 18 States was $4,358,000 less than the farmers of one State, the State of Alabama, paid for their fertilizer bill, in 1920, $20,000,000.

Mr. President, Senators can get up and occupy the floor and have the smiling approval of the Federal Reserve Board governor from the Senate gallery. Our good friend from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who tried to kill this Federal reserve banking system, comes over and whispers honeyed words into the ear of the Senator from Virginia, and falls upon his neck with loving manifestations of approval. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] comes over and expresses his commendation, and the Senator from Virginia throws out his chest and feels happy that he has won their approval. He is welcome to it as far as I am concerned.

Mr. President, I want to show you what the papers say. I want to show you what a banker in my State wrote me about Gov. Harding. Here is what this banker said:

> Last year when we were struggling with the destructive deflation propaganda, and about the time when you kindly came here to help in the fight against the powers that be, Gov. Harding took a circle through the South making speeches and excusing the reserve banks for their lack of interest in and care for the welfare of the people who are feeding them and the world, and stated in Atlanta that it was not the function of the reserve banks to aid farmers in holding their products. Within two hours after this speech was made cotton fell $10 a bale and would have gone lower had it not been for a rule of the exchange.

I know more about him and his policy than the Senator from Virginia knows, and I do not intend that he shall intrude himself into the affairs of the people of my State and assail me in defense of a man whose deflation record I repudiate and the honest business men of the country repudiate. He and the board have lost the confidence of the honest business men of America. That is plain talk, but it is the plain truth.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have been receiving numerous letters, some from bankers, great bankers in the country, asking me to keep their names out of the public prints, and not let it be known that they are afraid of the Federal Reserve Board. Can the Senator tell me why they are afraid of them?

Mr. HEFLIN. I made reference to something like that a while ago. I have had them myself. They are afraid of them because of the dictatorial and arbitrary powers exercised by that board.

"We understand that you are making complaint to HEFLIN and OVERMAN and ROBINSON and SMITH and FLETCHER and TRAMMELL and WATSON and HARRIS and others who dare to fight for their people in distress and demand a square deal. We understand you are writing to them." They do not want their names used because they are afraid something like that will come to them from the board or its friends. Why, this board is as egotistical and jealous of its ruinous policy as the Senator from Virginia is of his part in the authorship of this act. Anybody who criticizes it is a demagogue.

Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia looks down with pity upon one of us who dares to criticize the infamous deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. He seems to think that beside him upon this question there is none other. I am reminded of the story of Bill Burton and Tom Gowan. They were running for Congress, and Bill was in the House. He threw out his chest, and said: "Why, I presided over the constitutional convention of my State. My decisions were heralded the country over. I was regarded as a great parliamentarian. When the legislature assembled, following the ratification of the constitution, I was first speaker of the house of representatives. I presided over its deliberations. I was regarded everywhere as a great authority upon parliamentary procedure. When I went to Congress, and old Champ Clark got into a tangle, he called me to the chair, and I presided, and helped him out of the tangle, and the papers praised me the country over, and after I had settled the thing and walked down out of the chair, the Members of the House all applauded me, and thanked me for getting them out of the tangle, and yet I, even I, have got to contend with a man here for reelection to the House. I resent it."

Tom Gowan got up and said: "Ladies and gentlemen, I dreamt last night that I died and went to heaven, and when I walked in Solomon was presiding over the courts of glory, and old Pericles and Solon and Cicero were taking part in the debate; and I saw an archangel appear by Solomon's side and whisper something into his ear, and a troubled look came over his face, and Solon arose and asked: 'What means this troubled look on the face of Solomon?' The archangel said: 'Bill Burton, the great parliamentarian from Virginia, has arrived, and Solomon has got to give up his place.'" [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I make no application of this story. It makes its own application. Now, Mr. President, we are going to fight on and on until we get a real farmer on the Federal Reserve Board. We are going to provide for this thing in the law.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the fact that neither his facts nor his figures agree with my facts and my figures. My reading of history teaches me that Pericles went to hell, and his that he went to heaven. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I had rather take the chances of Pericles for eternal bliss than to have the chance of the members of the Federal Reserve Board or anybody here who defends their deadly deflation policy. [Laughter.] Why, Mr. President, Pluto's infernal region is full of fellows better than some of these. [Laughter.]

Now, let me read a line from an ex-governor of North Carolina, to let the Senator from Virginia know that he did not know what he was talking about and that while there are some of us who do not know as much about the technique of the banking business that he refers to, but who know a great deal more about the practical uses of money and credit amongst the masses of the people. Let me read from ex-Gov. Bickett. We had him before our committee, and here is what he swore:

> One thing we call attention to is the present policy to call loans.

Listen! This was in December, 1920.

> I happen to know that down in my State of North Carolina there is a disposition, and the bankers say it is because of instructions approved by the Federal Reserve Board, to call loans.

Ah, Mr. President, I am not reading from statistics fixed up by the Federal Reserve Board. I do not accept some of them. I accept John Skelton Williams's statement against the Federal Reserve Board and all their defenders.

Let me read a little further. This is from the ex-governor of North Carolina—a good man. I know him. He says that loans were called, and the bankers said that the Federal Reserve Board is working this policy.

He continued:

> Gentlemen of the committee, the situation with us in the South is more than distressing. It is tragic.

Yet the Senator from Virginia says that the policy of the Federal Reserve Board saved agriculture in the South—saved it! God deliver us from such saviors! If the Federal Reserve Board's policy has saved us, we denounce and repudiate such salvation.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do.

Mr. GLASS. May I suggest that the Senator from Alabama apparently does not understand the significance of his own information and of the documents from which he is reading. Gov. Bickett was talking in December, 1920, when cotton was down to 11 cents. The damage had then been done. That was practically the end of the period of falling prices; but the Senator does not seem to understand that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, again I differ with my good friend the genial financial genius from Virginia. Practically done then! Why, men killed themselves in the spring of 1921 and in the summer of 1921. Our people are yet in the throes of distress under this system of the Federal Reserve Board.

I admit that the fight that I and others have made here has forced them to reduce their rediscount rate, and we have saved the Government several million dollars on that bank building in New York, and before we get through with them we are going either to stop it, save more, or put somebody in the penitentiary.

The Senator from Virginia can not rise up here and whitewash men whose tracks are covered over with suspicious acts and crooked doings. Why, they raised their own salaries in the New York bank to thousands and thousands of dollars, and when we pinned the Senator down and asked him if he thought $50,000 was a proper salary to be paid to one man he had to change front. But they raised their own salaries and they raised their clerks' salaries from $1,200 and $1,600 to $12,000 and $16,000. It was unjustified, and I think there is something crooked about that. That is my thought. I am responsible for my thoughts, and I think the majority of the people will agree with me. You can not take the people's money and handle it like that.

Mr. President, they are building a gymnasium and a swimming pool. The Senator from Virginia is in favor of establishing swimming pools in New York City and gymnasiums for the elite up there. Let them swing and whirl and then plunge in the pool and swim, while the farmer says, "Mary, I have stood this strain as long as I can. I have been to the bank to-day. I can not get any more loans. I am tied up. I have lost all that I made in 1920 and all that I made in 1921. My debts are hanging heavy over my head. What am I to do?" I call that to the attention of the Senator from Virginia when they expend $20,000,000 or $26,000,000 or $27,000,000 to build a bank palace in Wall Street, in the great city of New York, and raise the salaries of clerks from $1,200 and $1,600 and $1,800 to $12,000, $16,000, and $18,000. Shame on them! And I repeat the bank deal is covered all over with the atmosphere of graft.

Mr. EDGE and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not yield for any speech.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey just for a question.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, we have just 20 minutes before the 5-minute rule goes into effect, and I know that the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], wishes to speak directly to the bill upon which the Senate will vote an hour later. I am just wondering if it is not possible for the Senator from Alabama, at least, to give the Senator from Connecticut an opportunity to discuss the measure. He can not discuss it after 3 o'clock.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator for calling the matter to my attention. I had intended to quit sooner, and I will do it in three minutes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. Just for a minute.

Mr. GLASS. It will not take a minute. I want to say to the Senator that the shoe factories in my town in Virginia provide a swimming pool for their employees. The cotton mills of the great Riverside Cotton Corporation in Danville, as my colleague knows, provide cafeterias and assembly halls and swimming pools for their employees.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I know that, Mr. President.

Mr. GLASS. And the Senate of the United States provides a marble-bound swimming pool for the Members of this body. Is it possible that the Senator from Alabama does not believe in people washing?

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, Mr. President, I am exceedingly fond of it. That is the reason why I am working on the Senator from Virginia. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I want to tell the Senator from Virginia that when the cotton mills build swimming pools and cafeterias, they are doing it out of their profits, honestly earned. When the bank of New York builds this building, it is doing it out of the blood money wrung from the people of the South and West through high rediscount rates. I want to say to him again that the Government of the United States, in providing a swimming pool for Senators, spent less for that building, this Capitol Building, the House Office Building, and the State, War, and Navy Building than the cost of the building which the New York reserve bank is putting up in New York City out of the blood money they wrung from the South and West. That, too, is plain talk, but the time has come for plain talk. I am going to keep faith with my friend from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], who reminded me that the time for voting is fast approaching. Let me read what the New York Commercial of September 16, 1920, among other things, said:

> Gov. Harding frowned upon the proposal that additional credits be provided as a means of holding cotton in warehouses beyond the usual marketing period in order to insure better prices.

The Federal Reserve Board's policy broke the price of cotton and then it refused to aid us in holding for a price that would cover the cost of production.

Their deflation policy broke the price of cotton in seven weeks $45 a bale, or $45,000 on a thousand bales.

The Senator from Virginia referred to what I said in a former speech about the friends of the Federal Reserve Board speculating in cotton on the bear side at that time. I said then, and I repeat now, that if their friends were speculating in cotton on the bear side, that they made in seven weeks on 1,000 bales of cotton $45,000. I repeat that Gov. Harding and the other members of the Federal Reserve Board knew exactly the effect that their deflation policy would have upon the cotton market.

Do you blame the cotton farmer for wanting to hold cotton for a price that would yield a profit? We tried to obtain loans on cotton so that we could hold it until the price would at least cover the cost of production, but the Federal Reserve Board refused to permit us to have such aid and our cotton farmers were robbed of millions and millions of dollars.

Mr. President, I do not intend to consume any more time. I will include these statements in my speech:

[From page 5936, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 22, 1921.]

Former Senator Gronna, at the December meeting, has this to say:

"Let me say this: I dislike very much to be a witness before this committee, but let me tell you what happened in St. Paul the other day. Since you have brought this up, I think I might just as well tell the truth.

"We had over a hundred head of large cattle which we shipped to St. Paul. We found the markets demoralized, and we wanted to ship them to Illinois and feed them. We could not get a loan of $1 on those cattle.

"Mr. THOMPSON. Whom did you go to, Senator?

"Senator GRONNA. We went to the people right there in St. Paul and Minneapolis, and they said they were not advancing a dollar on cattle. The ninth Federal reserve district does not furnish any money to the producers of the country.

"I just want that to go in the record, that the country is not being supplied with money. The feeders and purchasers of cattle are not being furnished with money."

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Oct. 14. Speech by Senator HEFLIN, delivered Oct. 12.]

Mr. Alexander Smith, of Atlanta, attorney for the assaulted banks, said:

"In view of the statement yesterday by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, that these things were not being done with his knowledge and consent, I wish to introduce an original letter from Mr. E. P. Tyner, assistant cashier of the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, dated December 3, 1919, containing this paragraph:

"'Our action in adding the entire State of Missouri to the par list was taken at the request and with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board at Washington,'" etc.

Moreover, it was testified by Mr. Clairborne, of the Whitney Central National Bank of New Orleans:

"You (Congress) then refused to create a central bank in Washington, but what you have to-day is really a central bank in Washington. They are attempting to make out of these local boards boards which must submit absolutely to what Washington says. Those boards are not permitted to act for themselves; they get their instructions and advice from Washington."

* * * It is even worse than that, for this man has not only overruled the Congress of the United States by forcing on the country a central bank in defiance of orders not to; he has not only set himself up as an arbiter of prices and by deliberate intent broken the markets and pursued a policy which Abraham Lincoln denounced aforetime as dishonest and criminal.

Gov. Harding must get out! No man against whose actions the Supreme Court has rendered a decision couched in language probably never before used before that august tribunal can remain at the head of our national banking system.

The Supreme Court of the United States has rendered a decision against certain acts of the Federal Reserve Board in language so strong that we doubt whether any decision ever uttered by that august body has been couched in words so vigorous.

[From Manufacturers' Record.]

The business of the country has been robbed to enrich the coffers of financial institutions over the protests of many far-seeing and honorable bankers. The profits that Gov. Harding has sought to explain can not be explained. They stand as an immutable evidence of the poverty of his financial direction.

The Federal reserve system financed the war; it could not finance the peace. So is the record written; so is it written in shame. Out of our vast resources flowed in endless streams the means to drive back the Hun. Then almost overnight Gov. Harding and his associates decided that the onslaught of approaching economic disaster should not be financed; that the reservoirs should be closed; and decided on a course of action that facilitated disaster. The law itself provided for extraordinary use of credit in case of just such a situation as the country faced, permitting a lowering of the necessary reserves. Gov. Harding refused to take advantage of that provision. He turned his back on it and faced the other way. What is a reserve for? To be used, of course, when need arises. That is just when Gov. Harding refused to use it. He hoarded the Nation's lifeblood and would not let it circulate.

Last summer, aware of the approaching disaster, John Skelton Williams, then Comptroller of the Currency, pointed out that $2,000,000,000 in additional credit could be extended without imperiling the reserve position.

And yet the Senator from Virginia blames me for criticizing and condemning the Federal Reserve Board governor whose deadly deflation policy has wrought so much financial disaster and business ruin in the country. The Senator from Virginia told us that cotton was 37 cents per pound in July, 1920, and 11 cents a pound in July, 1921. Now I want to tell the Senator that that was a loss of 26 cents per pound, or $130 a bale. This constituted a loss on one crop of 12,500,000 bales in 12 months of $1,625,000,000, and still the Senator defends the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I realize that it is utterly impossible to discuss the real subject before the Senate within the time limit. I have no doubt that Senators have made up their minds with regard to the measure, as very few Senators are present this afternoon; but I shall endeavor to the best of my ability, in the few minutes I have, to bring to the attention of the Senate some of the reasons why I do not believe the proposed legislation will be of any benefit to the farmer, and in the brief time I have I want to discuss the proposed legislation as a friend of the farmer.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], who has just concluded, when he refers to me puts me in the bankers' column. He insists that I am a banker. This is an illustration of the happy-go-lucky way in which the Senator from Alabama arrives at his conclusions of fact. I am not a banker. I have never been a banker. I have never had any official connection whatever with a bank. I do not know that I ever went into a bank unless it was to get a check cashed, or to deposit one.

I thank the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] for his analysis of this legislation, as he is a true friend of the dirt farmer, and because I deem it to be very accurate and very complete. If he is right in his statement, and most certainly he is, that this legislation would be of no benefit whatever to the agricultural interests, it seems to me folly to write it into the statute books. I regret that the Senator from Nebraska intimated that he might not vote as he shoots; that notwithstanding the fact that the legislation would be of no benefit to the farmer he might vote for it as a protest.

If he listened to the masterly presentation of the operations of the Federal Reserve Board which has been given to the Senate by the Senator from Virginia, I can not understand how he can vote for it as a protest, because, it seems to me, that, if the Senator from Virginia is right, Congress ought to adopt resolutions thanking the Federal Reserve Board, because, in spite of the obstacles of the World War and the malicious attacks of its enemies, they have established the Federal reserve system upon foundations so sound that nothing but interference on the part of Congress can shake them.

But, Mr. President, time is flying, and, as I have said, I want to call the attention of Senators who represent the great agricultural interests of the West to my view of the effect of this legislation upon them.

It seems to me that we ought to look at it in a sane and sober light, and not increase the membership of the Federal Reserve Board unless an increase would accomplish something, because it must be conceded by all that a board of 8 members invites deadlock, and deadlocks would be most unfortunate in that high court of finance, and if 7 competent men are not capable of transacting the business which comes before that board, 17 will not be competent.

Mr. President, let us admit that the food producer is of first consequence, that he is hard hit and that Congress should do all in its power to help him. The only condition I would impose upon our effort is that it shall be intelligent. We all know the cause of the farmers' troubles. When the war came, the public treasuries of the world bid against each other for food. In the United States every back yard was converted into a garden and every field cultivated to its utmost. The farmers in the East, who had long been driven out of stock and grain production by their western competitors, began to raise wheat, corn, hogs, cattle, and sheep. They were told that it was a patriotic duty and they were told the truth. In the West, grain acreages increased rapidly and prices kept pace with the increase. We loaned our allies ten billions of dollars, a very large portion of which was spent in this country for food and other war supplies. In the years 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919, our exported surplus was enormous, yet prices remained sky-high because of the abnormal demand founded in the fear of world starvation. Congress as late as May, 1920, was deluged with petitions for relief from high prices. The Senate instructed the Banking and Currency Committee to inquire into and report their cause. Men who are now damning the Federal reserve system for its failure to sustain prices were in 1920 insisting that the Federal Reserve Board was responsible for the extortionate prices that the American people were compelled to pay for food and shelter and clothing. The truth is, the war gassed us stay-at-homes with easy money and then shell shocked us with high prices, and the worst offender of all was the Government. The war ended as most wars do, and the country went into the hospital for the inflated, as all countries must that have contracted this disease, and the only known cure for inflation is deflation. The food producer got his dose first, because food being the prime necessity always will be overproduced and hoarded in times of war. For illustration, let us take one of the principal food fats—lard. The hog being prolific by nature and lard being easily kept, it was the first important food product to take the inflation cure. Lard was a drug in the market a full year before wheat or cattle or corn felt the decline.

My recollection is that within a month after the war closed lard went to 19 cents a pound or less. It was not until late in the summer of 1920 that prices of other foods began to indicate the approach of a buyers' market. The cost of their production was heavy, and it was perfectly natural for the farmer to want to sell his produce at a profit. The farmer must save his capital if possible. Six months' paper secured by agricultural products was eligible for rediscount by Federal reserve banks, consequently member banks could take this paper and they did take it in very large totals. In some of the Western States 75 per cent of the loans in 1920 were made to farmers for the purpose of carrying their crops until they could be sold at a profit. But prices kept falling. We may say now that both banker and farmer should have realized the futility of attempting to prevent the inevitable, but that was too much to expect of human nature then. The farmer and everybody else hoped against hope that some miracle would interpose to prevent the lowering of prices below cost of production. The farmer had his bills to pay and his family to support. He must have capital for the coming season. It is easy now to see that if he had been compelled to sell his products early in the autumn of 1920 he would have been much better off, and that the six-months' agricultural paper which he thought would be his savior turned out to be an expensive luxury. The farmer found himself paying interest upon a debt secured by stuff that was constantly decreasing in value, and he wanted something done that would save him from insolvency. Practically he wanted help if help could be had. The first safe and sure thing lay in giving him reasonable protection against foreign competition, consequently the emergency tariffs were enacted. Then it occurred to him that there was a shortage of food in Europe and Congress should authorize the use of Government credit through the machinery of the War Finance Corporation in securing an orderly foreign market for his goods. This was done. An unsafe thing to do in normal times, but in a crisis chances must be taken, and they were taken.

The War Finance Corporation supplemented the banks, and almost unlimited credit was thus provided to assist in the orderly marketing of agricultural products. Still prices continued to fall, and the Secretary of Agriculture now tells us that the condition of the farmer has gone from bad to worse, until 25 per cent of the farmers are insolvent. So serious is the situation that the President has called another consultation of the agricultural specialists to see what can be done. If we are to render further intelligent assistance, we must bear in mind a lot of things. We must remember that farming, with all its hardships and drawbacks, is the profession which secures the largest degree of individual independence with the smallest amount of capital. If the farmer wants an hour or a day off he can get it and he is answerable to no one but himself. There is no profession that has within its daily routine so great a variety of healthful exercise for brain and body. Historically it is the most respected of all callings. From Abraham down the husbandman has been the pillar of state, the defender of law and order and justice. Moreover, the farmer and his family go hungry last. For these and many other reasons the profession has been crowded wherever land has been available, and it is perfectly natural that with our limitless and fertile acres competition should be active and at times destructive of profits. Since the introduction of modern farming implements we have produced in normal years much more than we could consume. We may lament that the number of farmers is decreasing, but we must remember that to-day one man with the aid of machinery can cultivate as many acres as three men could cultivate when I was a boy. These considerations must be taken into account by farmers as well as lawmakers. On the other hand, it is true that scientific and economical cooperation in the distribution and sale of foods has not kept pace with the increase in production. The farmer has faced not only a sellers' market at times but a market that has been manipulated to his disadvantage. Cooperative selling requires confidence in the cooperators. This is not easily attained where competition is active and the quality of the product varies. The individual farm hazard is great, depending upon the weather, freedom from blights and destructive pests.

The farmer's profit and loss account is subject to all manner of risks over which he has no control, and the man who shares this risk by lending him money expects and should receive a higher rate of interest than would be exacted on a safer loan. The lender of money is as human as the borrower and entitled to a square deal. The last thing any man wants to hear about himself is the whole truth. But the whole truth is the only thing that will help banker or farmer. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] tells us that the agricultural interests of the country are able to produce $22,000,000,000 worth of products in a year. He did not tell us what effect such production would have on prices. But never mind about that. I want to say to him that half that total sold at a profit of 10 per cent would in one year furnish all the capital needed to supply the farmers with all the credit they would need for legitimate purposes. Let me mention another thing that I am afraid is true: In 1919 the Senator from Iowa introduced a blue-sky law. The same gentlemen who are now in Washington representing the agricultural interests appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee in support of that law. They urged its enactment upon the ground that the farmers were investing their large profits in get-rich-quick schemes, mines without minerals, and oil wells without oil. My recollection is that some billions of dollars had gone into these Iowa things from the farmers' pockets in the years 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919. Others were speculating in real estate. I do not like to "twit on facts," but we all know that periods of depression are due to periods of extravagance and speculation. The specialist in industrial diseases does not like to tell his patients this, especially if he is a Member of Congress. I mention it in passing because I want the farmers of America to take and hold the position they are entitled to; but if they do it, they must remember that economy and self-reliance are at the foundation of all moral and material advancement, and it will not do any harm to have this fact mentioned while we are searching for more popular but useless substitutes.

Of course, some men lose their health without fault of their own, some men lose their savings without fault of their own, but as the world runs, speculation and extravagance are at the bottom of hard times just as thrift and willing service are at the bottom of good times. We must expect that good and bad times will follow each other with the regularity of the seasons, and they will continue to follow each other as long as seasons come and go. Bad times are quite as normal as good times, and more so with the farmer, and this ought not to be. When times have been especially good for a period they will be especially bad for a period. During and after every great war we have mad times as well as bad. One thing that human nature can not endure and will not have is monotony. The only normal thing in this world is constant change. Rising and falling prices write the romance and tragedy of trade. Rising prices please the seller, falling prices please the buyer. Inflation brings joy to the debtor, deflation to the creditor, and each will have his day in spite of kings or Congress. Congress has lent a willing ear to the farmer in the present crisis. We have raised the tariff for the farmer. I voted for it, insisting at the time that the benefits of protection if limited to a class would result in little or no benefit to that class. No doubt it has saved the sheep and cattle men from utter ruin, but that is not enough. The farmer must remember that the American eagle can not fly with one wing. The billions of dollars worth of produce raised by the 6,000,000 farmers of the country must be sold to those who produce other things, and unless the products of others can be sold at a profit the farmer will find himself without a market. If the farmers had been wisely led, they would have insisted upon reasonable protection for their best and major customer, the American consumer of food. We revived the War Finance Corporation for the purpose of enabling the farmers to market their surplus in an orderly manner. This bill passed the Senate without a roll call, yet the friends of the farmer did not agree as to its effect. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], who claims to be a leading specialist in the cure of agrarian ailments, insisted that the bill was a delusion and a snare, and that it stabbed the farmer in the back. Other Senators, equally proficient in the art of restoring lost credit, agreed with him. I do not think this measure stabbed the farmer in the back. It is my opinion that it did not stab him much of anywhere. If used to peg prices it will defeat its own purposes and bring wide disaster. As a temporary measure, used in a crisis like the present to enable the farmer to sell his surplus abroad, it is defensible and will be a benefit. In other words, its justification will entirely depend upon its administration.

Mr. President, it is now 3 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has until 5 minutes past 3.

Mr. McLEAN. I note in the publications issued by organized labor that the credit of the Government has been used by the War Finance Corporation for the benefit of the Sugar Trust and other predatory interests and Samuel Gompers insists that it might better be used for the maintenance of a living wage for the mechanics of the country. This view of the operation of the bill simply indicates what is bound to happen when the Government plays favorites with the public purse. Other minor remedies have been crystallized into law in the interest of the suffering farmer, but put them all together and we find the patient no better according to the testimony of his friends. What the farmer ought to have is credit where it is wisely required at a rate of interest fairly commensurate with the risk. With this in view Congress created the Federal land bank system, whereby a farmer can borrow $10,000, pledging his land as security, the money to be used in stocking his farm and raising at least one crop. But this in the opinion of those who represent the farmers here in Washington is not doing enough. We must lend the farmer $25,000 to begin with, procured in the first instance by Government instrumentalities in the shape of 5 per cent nontaxable bonds, then we must lend him such additional sums as he may need for such periods as he may desire and take his live stock and other farm products as security. Why not? Similia similibus curantur. The way to secure riches and happiness for the farmer is to get him into debt to the extent of $10,000, then make it $25,000 on his real estate, then when this is gone lend him as much as he may need to raise and market his crop. This cure will work first-rate provided the farmer who takes it dies a bachelor and without dependents before his first note becomes due and the lender of the money enjoys losing it. It has all the merits of the methods of Messrs. Ponzi and Wallingford.

I supported the Federal farm loan act because I know that farmers may wisely borrow at times, and I believe that they should be accommodated at reasonable rates. The young man just starting out, if he is made of the right stuff and has no capital, is justified in borrowing enough for a modest start. The man who has met with misfortune and must have temporary assistance should have it without extortion. But for the Government of the United States to invite multiplicity of encumbrances of the magnitude and kind urged by some of the gentlemen who represent the agricultural interests can not be approved by any real friend of the farmer. The small farmer finds competition fierce enough under existing conditions. If we raise the loan privilege to $25,000 on land and as much more as may be required on personal property, and by this method invite a large increase in the annual production of food, it will not help the farmers now in the business who find themselves faced with an unmarketable surplus. I am a firm believer in cooperative rural credits, and it may be that Congress can wisely help along this line. I mean crop and cattle raising credits extending for a year or more. But these credits should not be given the rediscount privilege. The Federal reserve banks should be kept clear of long-time chattel mortgages. Moreover, these mortgages can best be handled by cooperative credit unions in the States. State legislatures are close to conditions and the necessities of each section. The centralization of all authority in Washington is devitalizing to the States and demoralizing to the citizen. It is bound to play favorites and incur unnecessary expense and delay. It is absurd to say that an industry that can add twenty-two billions a year to the capital of the country can not furnish the few millions necessary to sustain the required agricultural credits in the great States of the West. Again, one remedy that will help the farmer more than any other will be found in cooperative marketing. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] is entirely right in urging this cure, and Congress should remove all obstacles that stand in the way of the sale and distribution of food products without waste and in a manner that will prevent ruinous competition.

I am opposed to monopoly and I am just as vigorously opposed to ruinous competition in labor or in the sale of the products of labor. Any effort that will put a fair share of the money which the consumer pays for his food into the pockets of the producer should be encouraged by Congress. But the farmer, in the experience he will have along this line if his experiments meet with success, will learn that the least the Federal Government has to do with his business the better off he will be. When the farmers of the country learn the lesson of legitimate cooperative marketing, learn to rely upon themselves in an honest endeavor to prevent the glutting of markets and the extortion of the speculators, they will spew the nipple of paternalism out of their mouths and tell Congress to keep out of their sunshine. First of all they will learn that low rates of interest accompany low prices. They will learn that when you undertake to fix the price of credits by law you will fix the price of everything upon which credits are based. Ex-Senator BURTON, one of the ablest men in the country, now a Member of the House, recently published a book entitled "Crises and Depressions." I wish every Member of this body could read it, and especially the chapter which deals with prices of goods and their effect upon interest rates. Throughout history high interests and high prices for goods and low interest rates and low prices have come and gone together in lock step. Any intelligent student of the subject must see that nothing else is possible.

When the junior Senator from Alabama and the senior Senator from South Carolina secure low interest rates by act of Congress they will have low prices for their cotton whether they want them or not. When cotton went to 40 cents a pound the discount rate was at its highest, and if cotton ever reaches 40 cents a pound again the discount rate again will be high.

Mr. President, if Congress had the power to accomplish the ultimate object sought in this bill and the proposed amendments, the cotton grower in the South would be the first to suffer. No bank in the Federal reserve system would remain there any longer than would be necessary for it to get out. The credit merchants of the country are as completely the slaves to the law of supply and demand as any other class of merchants. The competition among the banks is fierce and constant. Any arbitrary regulation of the interest rate below its market value would destroy the credit structure of the Nation. The bank would have to quit just as cotton growers would have to quit if Congress should arbitrarily fix the price of cotton below its cost. Other cures for the diseases now affecting the agricultural interests have been suggested by Members of this body, indicating a mastery of the subject quite equal to that displayed by the junior Senator from Alabama. I have not the time to read these bills, but their object is to bring prosperity to the farmer by increasing the quantity and cheapness of money to meet the need of the farmers. Start the printing presses, and start the men for State prison who decline to swap double eagles for pieces of paper 7 inches long by 3 inches wide. Why not? What is the use of paying interest to the bankers? What is the use of paying interest to anybody? Money making is a governmental function, in the opinion of the authors of these bills. Why not make it, and make folks take it in exchange for goods and labor just as they have done in Russia, and when we find ourselves starving to death perhaps Russia will send us bread enough to save the children—the adults will not be worth saving. Mr. President, printing a promise to pay dollars on green paper does not add to the wealth of the world. The Senator from South Carolina wants lower rates of interest for the farmer on the long-time accommodations which he must have. These rates are to be secured by putting a farmer on the Federal Reserve Board. The Senator from South Carolina is always frank. He wants a farmer on the board to act as the representative of the agricultural interests. In other words, he wants a man on the supreme court of finance who is prejudiced in favor of a certain class, and he wants him because he will exercise his authority in obedience to that prejudice. In the first place, the Federal Reserve Board can not and should not have control over interest rates charged the farmer by member banks. But never mind such inconsequential objections. If a farmer is to be put on the supreme court of finance, which class of farmers will pick the man? This is an important consideration. There are as many classes of farmers as there are trades, and their interests clash and are wide apart.

The cotton grower wants high prices for cotton and low prices for wheat. The wheat grower wants high prices for wheat and low prices for cotton. The cattle raiser wants low prices for grain and cotton and high prices for meat. The sugar producer wants high prices for sugar and low prices for grain and meat and cotton. The dairy man wants high prices for milk, butter, and cheese and low prices for cotton and sugar and grain. The orchard man wants high prices for fruit and low prices for sugar and meat and grain and cotton. Which interest, which class will the President recognize? And what will the other classes do when they find themselves hoist by their own petard? Mr. President, I could spend hours arguing the utter folly of this proposal of the Senator from South Carolina, and I could spend hours depicting the danger of class legislation in general, but I can not believe that it is necessary. Because of the enormous increase in the industrial activities of the Nation, their ever growing complexity, and the attendant temptation of one class to take advantage of another, Congress has created 50 or more bureaus, commissions, and boards, and has vested them with power to secure, if possible, equality under the law. The sole excuse for these organizations has been the hope of America that they would aid in preserving and perpetuating the general welfare of the American people. Members of these boards may enter any counting room and market place in this broad land for the purpose of securing information which will enable the Executive to punish monopoly, unfair competition, adulteration, and so forth. I repeat, these boards and commissions and bureaus have been created and multiplied to the end that equal rights may be enjoyed by all and special privileges by none. If our bureaumaniacs had any other purpose in piling up this mountain of officialdom, they have not disclosed it up to date. But we are told that the time has now arrived to tear down the temple of democracy and stick up a tent in its place, a tent as full of holes as a skimmer, and under which the farmer will be the first to get wet. You can not make me believe that the American farmer once he understands the purpose of this legislation will fail to grasp the serious mistake he is making. The junior Senator from Kansas does not agree with me apparently. He wants a farmer on the Federal Reserve Board in order that the demand of the National Farm Bureau for long-time loans may be realized.

Mr. President, I have already pointed out the reasons why this can not be done without destroying the Federal reserve system. As everyone knows, this system was created for the purpose of providing an elastic currency. A currency that will contract as well as expand must be based on short-time, self-liquidating, solvent paper. All the authorities will tell you, all experience has taught, that an asset currency to be safe must be based upon paper representing goods sold to be paid for on a day certain. A system so based will always furnish a full supply of currency to meet the legitimate needs of trade. The reserves of the national banks mobilized in the 12 banks of the Federal reserve system would be exhausted at the very time they were most needed if they were used as the basis for long-time loans based on growing crops, or cattle, or other goods in process of manufacture, unsold and with no assurance as to market or value. The slightest depression in prices or any uncertainty as to future markets would seriously disturb the whole credit fabric, and currency based on such security must expand until irredeemable and worthless, or forced liquidation must be resorted to at the very time when it will do the most damage. Russia is worth untold billions in potential wealth, yet Russia's promises to pay based upon the entire wealth of the nation, present and prospective, is worthless to-day. We can not avoid a similar fate if we follow a similar course, and why should the farmers' crops and stock be the first to be sacrificed in times of stringency? These long-time loans may be made by banks or by credit organizations created for that purpose. To use such loans as a basis for currency, as a basis for promises to pay gold dollars on demand, is absurd, and it will first destroy the man whose property must first respond. That is precisely what happened in 1921. I repeat, it was the six months farmers' paper based not upon products sold but upon products unsold and for which there was no market that stayed liquidation beyond the safety point. Surely the farmers do not want to repeat that experience. The farmer wants accommodations for a year or two years or three years perhaps. The man who wants to borrow money for a year must borrow that money from some one who has money to lend for a year. If the commercial banks have not sufficient funds for this purpose without sending the paper representing these loans to the Federal reserve banks to be used as a basis for currency, if additional machinery must be established by Congress, let us act intelligently and establish an independent system of rural credits that will help the farmer instead of making him the first victim whenever the market shifts from the seller to the buyer. And, finally, let me say that the fundamental fault of these schemes advocated by farmers is that they take into consideration the needs, deserts, and feelings of the borrower only.

If we can agree that lending money would be impossible until somebody has first saved it, if we can bear in mind that bankers can not create capital and can not lend it until somebody has created it and saved it and has left it with them for safe-keeping, we shall be in a state of mind to legislate wisely with regard to this all-important subject and not otherwise. The banker has troubles enough to keep his ledger ready for the qualified examiners under the most favorable conditions. He knows what it will mean to him and his depositors and his community should he let his sympathies run away with his judgment and his bank become insolvent. Surely the man who economizes and scrimps and saves money and puts it in a bank for safe-keeping against a rainy day is entitled to as much consideration by the banker as the man who comes into the bank to borrow that money. The hard-working farmer or merchant or mechanic or clerk or anybody else who by self-denial and good judgment saves money feels as bad when he loses it as does the man who loses it for him, and in my opinion he is entitled to be heard when Congress proposes to load the dice against him. It is for this reason that I have felt it to be my duty to tell both sides of the story.

The Federal reserve system may have its weak spots. In my opinion it would have been more efficient and less expensive with fewer banks. Five banks would have been much more efficient than 12. I think the members of the Federal Reserve Board should be entirely free from executive control or influence. We have the greatest respect for our Secretaries of the Treasury, past and present. We have every reason to expect that no Secretary of the Treasury in the future will unduly use his power as chairman of the Federal Reserve Board to further the interests of class or party, but, Mr. President, this high court of finance, the highest in the world, should be delivered from possible temptations of that sort. The Bank of England has endured for more than two centuries and grown in strength with the passing years largely because it has been absolutely independent of all governmental interference with its legitimate functions.

The members of the Federal Reserve Board should be chosen because of their commanding integrity and unquestioned fitness for the duties which they must perform. The President, under the law as it now reads, can constitute the board entirely of farmers if he chooses. There is no reason why he should not do this if his selections are qualified to interpret and administer the Federal reserve act, but whoever is chosen for this responsible position, be he farmer, banker, merchant, manufacturer, or economist, should be chosen because he is honest enough and knows enough to administer the law impartially, and for no other reason. Of the 30,000 banks in the country less than one-third have joined the Federal reserve system. I am informed banks that have joined are getting out. I am told that the primary reason why so many banks are unattracted by the Federal reserve system is the well-founded fear of congressional meddling. Every bank in the country ought to belong to the Federal reserve system. That was the hope of its founders, but Congress can not compel the outside banks to come in or keep the member banks from going out. Certainly no bank will join the system or remain in the system unless you leave with it absolute freedom of contract with its customers, and no bank will remain in the system or come in if it is to be subjected to constant pressure by officials who with the best of motives urge or advise unsafe and unsound banking practices. As I remarked the other day, there is no governmental function where grave errors can be more easily made or less easily remedied than in the attempt to provide money for everybody whenever he thinks he needs it. The members of the Federal Reserve Board have been subjected to constant and severe criticisms for a year or more, and it is my candid opinion that the members of the board deserve great praise for their forbearance. Being human, they have probably made mistakes, but their record as a whole is a remarkably good one. The wonder is that with all the obstacles that have been put in its path by the Great War and the persistent attacks of its critics, the Federal Reserve Board has not only saved the new banking and currency system from its misinformed but very active enemies but has established it upon foundations which only Congress can disturb. I hope Congress will now and in the future strengthen these foundations and not destroy them, and it is for this reason that I ask the Senate at this time to refrain from enacting laws which are condemned by the Federal Reserve Board and its advisory council and by every impartial student of the subject. In any event, as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency I feel it to be my duty to urge caution in the consideration of legislation affecting the banking and currency system of the country and place the responsibility for hasty and ill-advised and dangerous legislation where it can be identified, to say the least.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] to the committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us have it reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the committee.

The READING CLERK. Add at the end of the committee amendment:

> The Federal Reserve Board shall have no authority hereafter to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any building of any kind or character, or to authorize the erection of any building, without the consent of Congress having previously been given therefor in express terms.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the amendment offered to the committee amendment or to the substitute proposed by the Senator from South Carolina?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is offered to the committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. My parliamentary inquiry is this: Could not the Senator from Georgia withdraw his amendment and wait until the Senate had determined as between the committee amendment and the substitute that is going to be offered, I understand, and then offer his amendment after the committee amendment has been perfected? In other words, if his amendment is offered now to the committee amendment and the committee amendment is stricken out by the substitute, his amendment, of course, would go with the committee amendment.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I would like to suggest at this time that I believe the more usual and better method is first to perfect the committee amendment as a majority of the Senate may want to have it perfected and then vote as between it and the substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that is what we are probably doing, but my question is, would it not be in order to offer the same amendment after we have voted as between those two?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it would be in order.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to voting on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, provided I can have a vote on my amendment afterwards.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understand the Senator from Georgia is willing to accept this modification of his amendment:

Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to any building now under construction.

Mr. HARRIS. I am perfectly willing to accept that.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to suggest to the Senator that he withdraw his amendment temporarily until we can determine as between the other amendments what is going to be adopted.

Mr. HARRIS. I am willing to withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia is modified in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, and, as modified, it is withdrawn by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask leave to correct the original amendment. There was a mistake in the printing. As originally introduced it was correct. On page 4, line 8, change the word "five" to "six." I ask that it be corrected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so corrected.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, with a view to perfecting the committee amendment before we shall vote on a choice between it and the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], I move that the committee amendment, the bill as reported out of the committee and recommended by the committee, be amended by striking out of line 3, on page 3, the word "different," and further by inserting between the words "commercial" and "industrial," in line 3, on page page 3, the word "and"; and further by striking out of line 4, on page 3, the word "and," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "interests and of the," so that particular clause would read:

In selecting the five appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board, not more than one of whom shall be selected from any one Federal reserve district, the President shall have due regard to a fair representation of the agricultural, commercial, and industrial interests and of the geographical divisions of the country.

That would add the word "agricultural" to the words "commercial and industrial" already in the Federal reserve act, and would make it plain that the agricultural, commercial, and industrial interests are each and all to be represented in the composition of the Federal Reserve Board. The way the bill now reads, as amended and reported by the committee, is simply that the different agricultural, commercial, industrial, and geographical divisions of the country shall be recognized. It seems to relate merely to geographical location and not to those interests. The amendment I propose is intended to make it plain that not only are commercial, industrial, and agricultural interests to be recognized, but as well the geographical divisions of the country.

If the committee amendment should be amended in that way, it would certainly result in agricultural representation on the Federal Reserve Board, as well as commercial and industrial representation, and I believe would answer the purpose better and would be better and fairer than the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], because it would save adding another member to the board. I believe agriculture should be represented on the Federal Reserve Board, as well as commerce and industry, both of which are now provided for by the present law. Agriculture has just as much right to representation as commerce and industry. It is just as important. However, I can see no reason for increasing the membership of the board. It is unnecessary and inadvisable. Therefore, if this amendment to the committee bill now offered by me be adopted, as I hope it may be, I shall then vote for the committee bill in preference to the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CALDER obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. We are discussing some very important matters at this time. Will the Senator allow me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. CALDER. I trust the Senator will not insist upon the point of no quorum. It would take up 10 or 15 minutes time and we only have until 4 o'clock to discuss the pending bill.

Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the country and the Senate upon the splendid address of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who has given an exposition of the operations of the Federal Reserve Board and of the Federal reserve system that the country needed and which has been most informing, I am sure, to the Members of this body. I know that I can say nothing to add to what he has stated and what the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. MCLEAN] has said. They made it clear that this institution has done a wonderful service to the country, particularly during the war, and that it was one of the things that did most to make it possible for us to go through the war without serious financial difficulty.

In the few moments which I have at my disposal I wish to ask permission to insert in the RECORD two articles from the Wall Street Journal, one dated December 29 and one January 10. In the one of December 29 reference is made to a statement made by the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] concerning the president of the American Cotton Association, Hon. J. S. Wannamaker. He stated that the Wall Street Journal had maligned Mr. Wannamaker, which the paper goes on to prove is not true. Then in the editorial of January 10 it quotes from a letter of Mr. Wannamaker, denying the fact that the Wall Street Journal had commented improperly upon him.

There being no objection, the articles referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Dec. 29, 1921.]

REFERRED TO THE JOURNAL OF COMMERCE.

Once again the Wall Street Journal has been brought to trial. This time the prosecuting attorney was the honorable Mr. HEFLIN, Senator from Alabama, and the forum was the floor of the United States Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN was laboring to convince the Senate that the Federal Reserve Board should have a farmer in its membership, presumably to instruct the others in banking. To prove his contention he launched into an attack upon the Wall Street Journal. The substance of his charge was that—

"Not long ago the Wall Street Journal leveled a very bitter criticism against the president of the American Cotton Association, Hon. J. S. Wannamaker, an honored citizen of South Carolina, a great American patriot, and a man of unimpeachable integrity. The Wall Street Journal charges that he carried on a propaganda for the purpose of deceiving the public and deceiving the Agricultural Department as to the statistical position of cotton and as to the acreage to be planted in cotton for the year 1921. I denounce the attack as unwarranted and the article as untrue."

This last sentence sounds like the challenge of the king at arms, at an English coronation—and means as much. Then again:

"Let me call the attention of Senators to an article appearing in the Wall Street Journal. It reads: 'The Journal of Commerce received frequent press dispatches from him (referring to Mr. Wannamaker), usually filed as press matter and offered prepaid. So long as they seemed rational and trustworthy they were used, generally with some condensation, but long ago their tone became so abusive of reputable textile leaders who disagreed with him, and his assertions were so palpably biased and absurd that further dispatches were refused and he was forced to turn to other papers less discriminating in their columns.'"

Of course, such a criticism of Mr. Wannamaker by the Wall Street Journal is sufficient to convince anyone that the financial system of this country is not safe until a farmer—reversing the example of Cincinnatus—leaves his plow and assumes direction of the banking business of the richest country on earth. The prosecutor is so convinced of this that nine times he specifically names the Wall Street Journal as the criminal who would return Wall Street "to the time when it can control the money supply and credits of 100,000,000 people."

But the defendant pleads "not guilty." It objects to the admission of this evidence as incompetent and irrelevant. It invokes the rule of law that secondary evidence can not be given, and that when evidence from a document is to be given the paper itself must be produced. The Wall Street Journal is on file in the Congressional Library and is accessible to the prosecutor. Let him produce his evidence, if he can. The Wall Street Journal never published one line or one word of the stuff here charged and "quoted."

There is an old rule of evidence which says, "False in one, false in everything." The Senator made serious charges against the Federal reserve. Do they, too, stand on the same foundation?

Mr. CALDER. In view of the editorial of December 29, the following from the same publication of January 10 is very interesting:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 10, 1922.]

BUT SUPPOSE THE SENATOR APOLOGIZES?

Here are some paragraphs from a letter written by President J. S. Wannamaker, of the American Cotton Association:

"I have been advised that in a recent speech delivered by Senator HEFLIN, of Alabama, in the United States Senate, he took occasion to attack the Wall Street Journal for articles and editorial which appeared in the Journal of Commerce on December 6.

"I very deeply regret that Senator HEFLIN should have made this unfortunate error in his address. We look upon the Wall Street Journal as a strong and forceful friend of the cotton-growing interests and read the various issues of your paper with deep interest and commendation. * * *

"We beg to assure you of our full indorsement of the policy of the Wall Street Journal and again wish to express our deepest regret that Senator HEFLIN should have made the error of naming the Wall Street Journal in his speech when he should have specifically referred to the New York Journal of Commerce."

This is excellent so far as it goes, but the apology should come from Senator HEFLIN. He knows that the Journal of Commerce is published in New York, but there is another daily of the same name, reputation, and standing published in Chicago. The name of the paper, therefore, would not convey to his rural readers the offensive "Wall Street" connotation. How simple, therefore, to ascribe the quotations to which he objected to the Wall Street Journal, and so kill two birds with one stone. The device is not new.

When any decent newspaper does an injustice to a citizen, whether a Senator or a shoeblack, it gives him honorable amend, with a publicity equal to the original injury. But southern chivalry, as personified in Senator HEFLIN, does not apparently extend to correcting his false imputation upon the Wall Street Journal on the floor of the United States Senate, where the utterly unjustifiable attack was made.

Mr. Wannamaker must see that his apology does not cover the needs of the case. Senator HEFLIN'S speech was largely a defense of Mr. Wannamaker and the American Cotton Association. The influence of that institution and its president, therefore, should be directed to bringing to Senator HEFLIN a sense of manliness, as they are understood by gentlemen, not merely in the South but anywhere.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I wish also to have printed in the RECORD a statement issued by the War Finance Corporation on January 6 indicating the loans they had advanced to cooperative associations, to banking and financial institutions, and to exporters.

These sums during the calendar year 1921 totaled $196,000,000. Of that sum, Mr. President, only $300,000, or less than one-half of 1 per cent, was loaned to individuals or banks in the State of New York. The great State which last year paid more taxes than 30 other States put together took advantage of this institution only to the extent of one-half of 1 per cent. The figures are very illuminating and indicate that through the War Finance Corporation vast sums of the people's money were loaned to the agricultural interests of the country. It is worthy of note, Mr. President, that the managing director of this corporation is Mr. Eugene Meyer, jr., a resident of New York and Wall Street banker. While the farmers of New York State have not taken advantage of the opportunities offered by the War Finance Corporation, I want to go on record as commending its work. I urged its revival and believe it has justified the confidence I had in it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the document referred to by the Senator from New York will be printed in the RECORD.

The document referred to is as follows:

Mr. CALDER. I wish now to call attention of the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to a letter which that Senator read into the RECORD recently. It was a very interesting document, written by Mr. John Skelton Williams, and having to do with a criticism of the Federal reserve bank at New York. In that letter Mr. Williams quoted Scripture. The quotation was taken from an interview which apparently occurred between the Queen of Sheba and King Solomon. The quotation given by Mr. Williams is from First Book of Kings, tenth chapter, sixth and seventh verses, and reads, according to his revised version:

It was a true report that I heard in mine own land of thy acts. * * * Howbeit I believed not the words, until I came and mine eyes had seen it; and, behold, the half was not told me!

I am sure that the junior Senator from North Carolina, who is himself a great Bible student, would never have even brought the attention of the Senate to this matter if he had not had it called directly to his attention. As quoted by the Senator from North Carolina the sixth verse reads:

And she said to the king, It was a true report that I heard in mine own land of thy acts.

The two verses as they actually appear in Chapter X, First Book of Kings, are as follows:

6. And she said to the king, It was a true report that I heard in mine own land of thy acts and of thy wisdom.

7. Howbeit, I believed not the words; until I came, and mine eyes had seen it; and, behold, the half was not told me.

Then this was left out—

thy wisdom and prosperity exceedeth the fame which I heard.

Mr. Williams has a remarkable faculty for supporting his arguments by the use of half truths, or 10 per cent truths, and he does not hesitate to suppress all facts and figures which would tend to disprove his statements. He uses only those which suit his immediate purpose. It seems that even when he quotes from the Bible he does not hesitate to expunge words from the text in order to suit himself. In order to draw a parallel between the alleged extravagance and magnificence of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York with that of Solomon, he undertakes to change the meaning of the verses quoted by leaving out the portion which refers to the wisdom of Solomon. He is, of course, unwilling to concede that there has been any wisdom or judgment whatever in the administration of the Federal reserve system.

[3] Section 24 was added to the original War Finance Corporation act by the agricultural credits act of August 24, 1921.

[4] Includes advances aggregating $26,425,460.44 originally applied for and approved under section 21 for export purposes and subsequently withdrawn by the applicants and resubmitted and approved as advances for agricultural purposes under section 24.

It may be interesting to quote a part of Chapter X which precedes the two verses above quoted:

1. And when the Queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon concerning the name of the Lord, she came to prove him with hard questions.
3. And Solomon told her all her questions; there was not anything hid from the king, which he told her not.
4. And when the Queen of Sheba had seen all Solomon's wisdom, and the house that he had built—

Then she uttered the words which appear in verses 6 and 7.

Senators who have seen the building which the Federal Reserve Bank of New York is constructing for the adequate accommodation of nearly 3,000 employees who conduct its routine operations and for the custody of its enormous amounts of cash and securities are in a psition to determine whether the construction of such a building is an act of folly and extravagance or whether the directors are wise in providing not only for immediate needs but allowing a margin for future expansion.

It is rather extraordinary to attempt to support a statement by making a distorted quotation from the Bible. In some cases such a practice would lead to startling results. For instance, how would the Ten Commandments sound if they should be quoted with the word "not" omitted in every case?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the point in the Biblical quotation to which the Senator has referred is, "The half has not been told." That is the point, but the Senator from New York has not seen it. The half was not told until I obtained from the Federal Reserve Board itself and read here a report showing actually what the building referred to is to cost. Notwithstanding the fact that Congress has turned over to the Federal Reserve Board every subtreasury building, they propose to construct buildings involving vast expenditures, when the Government has been getting along with these subtreasury buildings for 50 years. However, the Senator from New York has not seen the point in the statement. Whether or not the quotation was entirely accurate, the half had not been told, and it was not told until a report in writing was made here by the board itself, a copy of which I have in my desk.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator permit me to reply in his time?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CALDER. The half was not told. The country nor the Senate did not know of the splendid workings of this fine system. The Senator's inquiry, the Senator's statement, and the reading of the letter of Mr. Williams brought forth the information. We have had it to-day from his friend and my friend, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

Mr. OVERMAN. The report shows that this building was to cost over $19,000,000, though the Federal Reserve Board had under its control all of the subtreasury buildings which the Government could give them, and in which the business of the Government has been conducted for 50 years.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer an amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota may be received at a subsequent time.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I merely wish to say the brief word that is permitted within the space of five minutes. Of course, there is but one object intended by the proposed substitute, and that is to provide that the farming interests shall have a representative on the board. That is admitted, I believe, by the sponsors of the bill. In order to accomplish that, the membership of the board is to be increased by one additional member, at a cost of $12,000 per year, and I presume it is the understanding that a farmer will be named to fill the place so created.

While I concede very readily that the bill in its present form is a great improvement over the mandatory feature as presented in the former amendments, still my objection to the bill is that in effect—and, in my judgment, this can not be questioned—it constitutes a step in the direction of that type of class legislation which seeks to have classes represented on important Federal boards. In my judgment, such an innovation or policy in the final analysis can not be for the best interests of the country. I do not care how many farmers are on various boards, but their selection should be through merit and not compulsory.

I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was entirely correct in his criticism, although it may have been reached from a different premise, as to what possibly would be the actual result if this bill should become a law and a farmer should be named as a member of the Federal Reserve Board. What the farmers want, in my judgment, is more credit along proper, established, accepted banking lines, rather than simply a minority member of the Federal Reserve Board. I am quite sure that the board, acting according to their judgment along the line of a proper financial policy, could not do more than they have endeavored to do during the past two or three years in the effort to extend credit to the farmer. The board should be of supreme standing, acting from a judicial standpoint, uninfluenced by wishes of party or class.

Far better to do away with the Federal Reserve Board in its entirety and permit the regional boards to control the situation than to divide it up into classes.

More farmer representatives among the directors of the reserve banks would be far more useful than on the central board.

I think it has been stated, even by those who purport especially to represent the farmer, that the trouble was at times they were given too much credit, and to-day they are suffering to a great extent because of the debt thus created. The Commission on Agricultural Inquiry, which has been in session for some little time, have issued a preliminary report in which they have, I think, very wisely proposed a real plan of common-sense business credit, whereby live-stock dealers and farmers in all the different lines of agriculture may secure credit from the land banks for from six months to three years, as it is absolutely necessary they should have. We all are convinced of that, and they can thus secure credit without upsetting the present well-established, correct, and proper practices and policy of the Federal Reserve Board, which has stood all tests.

When their credits come within the six months' period of the Federal Reserve Board, under this proposed scheme, as I understand it, the member banks can rediscount their paper, and, during the time intervening, the two years or two years and a half, the issue of debentures upon actual stock or actual products will be provided for. That is common-sense banking, involving as it does borrowing on actual existing products.

In my judgment I think there will be scant satisfaction in simply having a farmer on the Federal Reserve Board; with no other type of Federal boards have we adopted the idea of having represented any special interest, be it farming or manufacturing or commercial business of any character. I think it is a step in the wrong direction, and, in the final analysis, will rise to plague its sponsors. As I have said, I do not believe that it will give the farmer as a class one particle of direct benefit, but it will break down the system and give support to the idea that we must have special classes represented on boards appointed under the Federal Government.

This country, Mr. President, in my judgment can never prosper to a maximum degree if we resort to class legislation. The country only goes ahead when the farmer, the banker, the commercial man, and every class of citizens operate together, recognizing their mutual interest—and there must be mutual interests—understanding and endeavoring jointly to meet each other's problems and establishing and operating and administering their various responsibilities along those lines. We can trust the President of the United States, whoever may be President, to name men to constitute boards qualified to carry out the responsibilities of those boards; but the proposal here means a breaking down of the system which has heretofore prevailed, a departure from a set policy and the establishment of a precedent destructive and un-Americanlike in the extreme.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to occupy the five minutes alloted to me in behalf of an amendment which I have offered and which, if adopted, would be numbered section 3. The proposed amendment reads as follows:

And the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount.

Mr. President, strange as it may seem, the paper of cotton factors in my State and in other States in the South is not eligible to rediscount in the Federal reserve banks. The amendment proposed by me merely makes such paper eligible. For instance, if a firm in the city where I reside, although it may be one of the strongest business firms in Memphis—and there are many such firms in that city—happen to be cotton factors, their paper is ineligible for rediscount. I am quite sure that it was never intended that such should be the case, and the amendment intended to be proposed by me merely corrects that omission.

I desire to call the attention of the Members of the Senate to the fact that the amendment has been referred to the Treasury Department and also to the Federal Reserve Board. I wish to read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury indorsing the amendment. It is addressed to me, and reads as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I received your letter of May 7, 1921, inclosing a copy of S. 1615, a bill to amend section 13 of the Federal reserve act in respect to the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors dealing exclusively with producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state. The Treasury does not offer any objection to the bill in this form.

Very truly, yours,

A. W. MELLON.

I also read a letter from Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, addressed to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee:

MAY 9, 1920.

Hon. GEORGE P. MCLEAN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have received your letter of May 6, in which you request the views of the Federal Reserve Board with regard to Senate bill 1615, the purpose of which is to amend section 13 of the Federal reserve act by inserting a provision to the effect that "the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors dealing exclusively with producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for discount."

The board desires to point out that in its judgment the phraseology of the proposed insertion would be improved if the words "making advances" were substituted for the word "dealing," in the seventh line of the bill, and the word "to" were substituted for the word "with" in the eighth line, so that the insertion would read "and the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount."

In my letter to you of December 19, 1920, expressing the board's views with regard to Senate bill 4537, which was intended to make eligible for rediscount the paper of cotton factors and commission merchants, it was pointed out that the paper was finance paper, rather than commercial or agricultural paper, since the borrower used the proceeds to make loans to his customers. The bill now under consideration—Senate bill 1615—is open to the same objection upon principle, but in view of the narrow scope of the bill under its restricted language, the Federal Reserve Board will offer no objection to it if amended as herein suggested.

Yours, very truly,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

Mr. President, the bill has been amended in strict accord with the views of the Federal Reserve Board and of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was written by Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. McLEAN. How has it been amended?

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been amended so as to read precisely as he points out that it should read. I read it:

And the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount.

Mr. McLEAN. Without security?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is precisely in the words of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and precisely as approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that some of this paper runs for years, and that the Federal Reserve Board is opposed to that paper unless it is secured, and I know of no way under heaven in which it can be secured.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad if the Senator will not take any more time than necessary during my five minutes.

I want to say that this is the only class of paper that is now discriminated against. An enormous amount of business is done in this way. Great productions are obtained, agricultural products are brought forth, through this kind of paper; and in my judgment there is no reason in the world why it should be discriminated against.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the proposed amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the objection made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], illustrate the danger that the Senate is liable to get into and that the House gets into and that we have gotten into in the past through passing anything in regard to any change of the Federal reserve system that the board is willing to accept.

The Senator from Tennessee, in arguing for his proposition, argues that it has been changed so as to meet the objections of the board; and the Senator from Connecticut, in his opposition, argues that it has not been changed to meet all of the objections of the board. There seems to be only one idea: Anything that can be proposed in the way of an amendment that the board will approve goes through. The only thing that Congress finds out is whether the board wants it or whether the board does not want it.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. McLEAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. Both of the Senators can talk at once if they want to, but I am not going to stop.

If the board wants it, we make a law of it. If the board does not want it, we kick it aside; and that is illustrated by the opposition, technically correct, made by the Senator from Virginia in connection with what I said. I had stated, in substance, that the Federal reserve bank in New York—I did not use the words "New York," but any of these banks—in using enormous sums of money were using money that was not theirs; that it belonged to the people of the United States; that it had been contributed by those who had been compelled to borrow money from banks, and therefore that these officials were occupying the position of a trustee, and that it was much worse for them to use this money recklessly and extravagantly than though they owned it themselves. The Senator from Virginia called my attention and the attention of the Senate to the fact that technically I am wrong about that. Technically, it is the money of this bank. Congress passed a law that made it the money of this bank. In other words, it was money that had been contributed by the borrowers, that came as a matter of fact from the people, and that under the general law would have become the property of the United States Government and gone into the Treasury had it not been that Congress passed a law that made it technically the property of these reserve regional banks.

The Senator from Virginia was right as a matter of technical legal procedure; and the reason why he was right was because, at a certain time, there came into the Senate and into the House a little bill that was backed up by the Federal Reserve Board, and nobody said anything except what they are saying now: "Does the Federal Reserve Board want it?" The answer was, "Yes; the Federal Reserve Board wants it." Therefore Congress passed it, it became a law, and now we have it thrown into our teeth when we call attention to the fact that they are extravagant, and it is said: "It is none of your business; it is our money, anyway. You made it our money by the act which you yourselves passed."

While that is fresh, while the ink is hardly dry on the paper that takes down the denial of my proposition made by the Senator from Virginia, here comes the Senator from Tennessee and it is all illustrated over again. "Let us change this law." "Well, what do the Federal Reserve Board say?" If they say it ought to be changed, we change it. If they are opposed to it, it must not be changed. They are the ones that are doing it.

Mr. President, this technicality does not do away with the responsibility resting upon these officials in regard to this money. In reality, it is a trust fund yet, as sacred as any trust fund that was ever administered by the guardian of a widow or an orphan. For that reason we ought to guard it with jealous care; and we ought also to remember that we ought to be careful about letting the Federal Reserve Board legislate in regard to their own business, their own duty, and the law that controls them in the management of our banking and financial institutions, because we shall again find ourselves later up against the charge, "Why, here; you have passed a law yourselves giving us that power."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. McLEAN and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I will yield to the Senator from Virginia if he desires to discuss this long-time paper.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I want to say just a word with respect to what the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has said.

I had supposed in the 20 years I have been here, during which period the Senator from Nebraska also has been here, that whenever a problem came up relating to any department of the Government it was the practice of the committee to which the bill was referred to refer that bill to the department for its comment and an expression of its judgment as to the judiciousness of the legislation proposed. If it affected the War Department, the bill would go to the Secretary of War; if it affected the Navy Department, it would go to the Secretary of the Navy, and so on, that Congress might be apprised of the opinion of those who were charged with the duty of familiarizing themselves more intimately with the facts, and that Congress might, therefore, act upon such information.

I agree that Congress should not be entirely controlled in its activities and in its determination of matters by the judgment of any of the departments; but certainly it is no offense for the Federal Reserve Board, upon request—and it was upon request—of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, to give its judgment respectfully upon these matters. That is what was done with respect to the bill of the Senator from Tennessee; and surely the Senator from Nebraska, in his reasoning and judgment, does not criticize the Federal Reserve Board for complying with the request of the Banking and Currency Committee for its opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I have no intention of doing so.

Mr. GLASS. I frequently differ from the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board; I frequently do not do what it wants done, and do somethings that it does not want done; but we ought to have its judgment upon things with which it is familiar.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I shall occupy only a minute in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

That is an old controversy. It has been in Congress for three or four years. I understand that the Federal Reserve Board, upon certain conditions, recommend that this paper be made eligible for rediscount, but it must be secured. I know of no way in which it can be secured. These cotton factors may not own a pound of cotton. It does not represent a sale of anything. They may hold this cotton for years.

The amendment goes to the very basis of the Federal reserve system; and I do not think it is wise to use a simple amendment like that offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], to add a member to the Federal Reserve Board, as a vehicle upon which to graft an amendment of the character of that offered by the Senator from Tennessee, which goes to the very foundation of this system.

Although this is the silly hour, and anything is likely to happen here, I sincerely hope that that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I am a great advocate of economy, and I believe in its practice both in public and in private life. I am satisfied that the building we have been talking about will cost entirely too much, and that the salaries paid are entirely too high; but my chief criticism is about the unwisdom of carrying on building operations while material and labor are so high. I think the board showed very poor judgment.

The Federal Reserve Board has been criticized here to-day on the ground of being opposed to the refunctioning of the War Finance Corporation. I feel that in justice to all parties I should state some facts that have come within my own observation.

In June, 1920, I appealed to the then Secretary of the Treasury to restore the War Finance Corporation. This he declined to do. Congress adjourned on the 5th of June, I think, that year. I came back to Washington, and was later appointed chairman of a committee by the American Cotton Association. I visited the Secretary of the Treasury and the members of the Federal Reserve Board on various occasions, and made every effort within my power to get the War Finance Corporation restored. I thought I could see that our product in the South would continue to decline. In justice to the members of that board, I must say that Mr. John Skelton Williams did everything in his power to get the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Houston, to let the corporation refunction; and Gov. Harding also joined and aided me most materially in trying to get Mr. Houston so to act. Gov. Harding wanted it to function under governmental agencies, such as we later provided for here in the Senate. I feel that it is due him to make that statement. The trouble was that the President of the United States at that time was ill and could not be approached, and the Secretary of the Treasury was unalterably opposed to allowing that institution to operate any more.

In fact, he wanted to wind it up, but was persuaded by Senators not to do so, but to leave it, so that if necessary to have it operate again he could put it back into action. So he was constantly opposed to it all the time until Congress passed an act requiring it to function again. We have received great benefits in our part of the country from that organization.

I am glad this controversy is about over. I hope we will get together and support this Federal reserve banking system. I feel that the Federal reserve banking law was one of the greatest laws, perhaps the greatest law, passed in this country in 50 years. If it had not been for that system, I am satisfied that practically everybody and every institution in my part of the country would have been in bankruptcy a long time ago.

I do not favor some of the conduct of those charged with the administration of the law. Certainly the prices of our products declined too rapidly; but I have not time to go into that now. I say that as a system it is a great system, and I am glad that we are now about to get together. I hope we will all be happy and pleased and come to the rescue of this law; and not only that, but that the banks all over the country will join the system.

The junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] complains about his bank not being able to get accommodation. If his bank and other banks in the country would join the system, or become eligible for loans under the system, there would be no trouble whatever in their getting a reasonable amount of money, on proper paper, at all times.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does not the Senator know that in a number of instances the farmers could not get loans?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and I am satisfied that if the Senate could understand the advantages which would flow from that amendment it would adopt it. For several years this class of paper was eligible for discount at the Federal reserve banks. About a year ago it was declared not eligible on account of an interpretation of the law; that is, the law said loans could be made on such paper for agricultural purposes but that the loan must be made directly to the person.

I am familiar with the handling of cotton in Norfolk, which will illustrate my point. I appeared before the board and tried to get that interpretation modified in connection with the cotton business in Norfolk. For several years the factors there had made advances to farmers for freight. They would get the cotton in Norfolk, would keep it until they got a shipload; they would make these advances, and after they got the shipload they would export the cotton. The paper they took was declared ineligible. The banks said that they could not discount that paper further, under their interpretation of the law. It had been discounted for several years.

This amendment is drawn in accordance with the suggestion of the Federal Reserve Board as to a measure that would make that class of paper eligible. It still must be good. The cotton factor of Norfolk goes to the member bank and puts his paper there, on which he has made advances to these agricultural people, the bank indorses it and sends it to the Federal reserve bank in Richmond and gets it discounted, and the refusal to accept that kind of paper has done a great deal to retard the distribution of crops by factors.

At the time this paper was declared ineligible, I appeared before the Federal Reserve Board with a committee from Norfolk composed of cotton commission merchants, who pointed out the difficulty that exists in the distribution of cotton unless the old custom were continued.

This is an amendment approved by the Federal Reserve Board. They have written a letter saying that it is all right, saying that they have no objection to it, and the Secretary of the Treasury approves it.

Mr. McLEAN. If it is properly secured.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is entirely mistaken about that. This does not waive the security. The cotton factor advances the freight. He takes the paper, indorses it to a member bank, the member bank approves it, indorses it, and sends it to Richmond, and this does not alter the security at all. With the note is filed a receipt for the cotton that is in a warehouse in Norfolk. To illustrate it, a man makes an advance on 10 bales of cotton. He advances the freight. He advances the money paid to cover it. He takes the note with that collateral, goes to the member bank in Norfolk, that member bank sends it to Richmond, and there is no waiver of security. The man must give his individual note, supplemented by this additional security, with the security of the member bank. That class of paper has been held eligible for several years, but after the interpretation given by the attorneys for the Federal Reserve Board, they said that under the terms of the act it was not eligible.

This amendment is to correct that evil. The Federal Reserve Board and the Secretary of the Treasury recommend it, and I see no reason why this right should be denied any longer.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I want to speak but one or two moments. I hope all of these amendments will be rejected. There has not been time and there will not be time to properly discuss them. Nobody knows what effect they will have. This very amendment illustrates what I mean. The Senator from Connecticut says it would require them to accept the paper without security. The Senator from Virginia says not.

I will not stop to discuss it further, because I do not wish to take the time of other Senators; but here is another amendment, offered by the Senator from Georgia, covering two or three pages, which changes the law as to discount, regulates the rate of interest, and requires that they should be the same in all Federal districts, a subject which has not been considered by the committee, has not been considered by the Federal Reserve Board, or anybody else, as far as I know.

Mr. McLEAN. It has been considered by the Federal Reserve Board, and they are unanimously opposed to it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will ask that the letter handed me by the Senator from Connecticut be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, January 11, 1921.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, inclosing copy of proposed amendment by Senator HARRIS to the amendment proposed by Senator SMITH to Senate bill 2263 to amend the Federal reserve act.

The Federal Reserve Board is unanimous in the view that the proposed amendment is unwise. It proposes to amend various paragraphs of the Federal reserve act so as to require that all discount rates in effect at the Federal reserve banks should be the same and that the interbank discount rate should also be the same for each Federal reserve bank.

Paragraph (b) of section 11 of the Federal reserve act already provides that the Federal Reserve Board shall fix the rates of interest to be charged by Federal reserve banks in rediscounting the discounted paper of other Federal reserve banks. No Federal reserve banks are at the present time rediscounting with other Federal reserve banks, but hitherto in fixing discount rates for these interbank transactions the board has adhered to two principles: (1) A borrowing Federal reserve bank should not be permitted to rediscount with another Federal reserve bank at a profit; and (2) a Federal reserve bank should not be required to lend indirectly to member banks in another district, by means of rediscounts for the Federal reserve bank of that district, at a rate of interest lower than that charged its own member banks. As the discount rates of a borrowing Federal reserve bank have rarely been lower than those of a lending bank, the application of a rule to these principles has usually resulted in having the borrowing Federal reserve bank pay to the lending bank the same rate of discount as the borrowing bank had itself charged its member banks.

The Aldrich bill provided that discount rates should be uniform throughout the country and should be fixed by the central board in Washington. Some of the earlier drafts of the Federal reserve bill provided also that rates should be uniform and that they should be fixed by the Federal Reserve Board for each Federal reserve bank. The proposed amendment of Senator Harris adds to the text of paragraph 2 of section 13 of the Federal reserve act, after "the Federal Reserve Board to have the right to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible for discount, within the meaning of this act," the words (lines 15 and 16, p. 2 of the bill) "and to fix rates of discount which shall be the same for every Federal reserve bank." At the same time the proposed Harris amendment, following the language of paragraph (d) of section 14 of the Federal reserve act authorizes the Federal reserve banks "(d) to establish from time to time, subject to the review and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, rates of discount to be charged by the Federal reserve bank for each class of paper, which shall be fixed with a view of accommodating commerce and business" (lines 16 to 20, p. 3 of bill). The Acting Attorney General of the United States in December, 1919, rendered an opinion to the effect that the Federal Reserve Board, under its power of review, has the right to fix the rate of discount to be charged by a Federal reserve bank, without awaiting the initiative of the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank. In view of this, it seems unnecessary to amend section 13 of the act to authorize the Federal Reserve Board to fix the rates of discount.

What the board objects to particularly is the provision that discount rates must be the same for every Federal reserve bank. Presumably the object of the proposed amendment is to prevent the establishment of higher rates by Federal reserve banks located in agricultural districts than prevail in those banks located in districts which are mainly industrial or commercial. In the board's opinion, based upon actual experience, the proposed amendment if adopted would operate in such a way as to be especially harmful to the very districts which it is designed to aid; that is, the districts in which the banks habitually borrow from other banks in financial centers.

In many of the States rates of interest ranging from 7 to 12 per cent are permitted by law, either as the legal rate or as the contract rate, and some States have no restriction upon the rate of interest that may be charged. In all States except those which have a maximum rate of 6 per cent the average rate charged by member banks to borrowers has always been greater than the average rate of discount charged by the Federal reserve bank.

During the last half of the year 1920 and in the early months of 1921, the Federal Reserve Banks of Boston, New York, and Chicago had a flat discount rate of 7 per cent, charged on all classes of paper. At the same time the Federal Reserve Banks of Philadelphia, Cleveland, Richmond, St. Louis, Kansas City, and San Francisco maintained a 6 per cent rate. For a part of the time the Federal Reserve Banks of Dallas and Atlanta had a normal 6 per cent rate, but had also the progressive rate, just as the Federal Reserve Banks of St. Louis and Kansas City did. Later on the Federal Reserve Banks of Dallas and Atlanta abolished the progressive rate and substituted a 7 per cent flat rate, but it is interesting to note that the average rate charged on all borrowings by all four banks or any of them which adopted the progressive rate amounted to considerably less than 7 per cent. For a time the strain upon the Federal Reserve Banks of Boston, New York, and Chicago was just as severe, if not even more so, than upon the other Federal reserve banks, and if the board had been obliged to establish a uniform rediscount rate in all districts the result would have been that the banks in agricultural districts would have been obliged to pay a higher rate than they actually did. As the money tension relaxed, discount rates were reduced beginning in April, 1921. The Federal Reserve Bank of Boston has had four and the Federal Reserve Bank of New York five successive reductions from 7 per cent down to the present rate of 4½ per cent. The Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago has made three successive reductions from 7 per cent down to the present rate of 5 per cent, and at the present time no Federal reserve bank has a discount rate higher than 5 per cent.

It should be borne in mind that in all Federal reserve districts there are minor financial centers which have banks which rediscount at times very heavily for the accommodation of their customers. Banks in these centers are not dependent entirely upon their local Federal reserve bank. They have maintained their connections with correspondents in the major financial centers, and while it may be more convenient for them to rediscount with the local Federal reserve bank, they naturally borrow in the cheapest market. It developed, therefore, after the rates had been reduced in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and St. Louis that many banks in other sections of the country found that they could rediscount a little more cheaply with correspondent banks in these cities than they could with their local Federal reserve bank. The result was that the pressure on Federal reserve banks, such as Richmond, Atlanta, Kansas City, and Dallas, was relaxed and they were able to reduce their rates, thus giving the smaller member banks a direct benefit which they might not otherwise have been able to receive.

As is well known, when the Federal reserve bill was being drafted much consideration was given to the question of whether there should be one central bank with branches or a regional system composed of several independent banks located in various parts of the country. The regional system was adopted, because it was thought that this country, with its wide expanse of territory and its varied and diversified interests, was not suited to a central banking system under the management of a single board of directors. It is generally recognized now, even by those who originally advocated a central bank, that the decision was a wise one. Should the amendment in question be adopted an initial step will be taken in destroying the regional character of the Federal reserve system and there would be imposed upon the Federal Reserve Board the difficult task of fixing rates of discount to be uniform and apply universally throughout the entire country without regard to temporary or seasonal conditions prevailing in the various sections. The board under its power of review already has the power to fix discount rates, which are first proposed by the directors of the various Federal reserve banks, and while at the present time the rates do not vary greatly in the different districts, it is easily conceivable that conditions may arise which would render greater differentials advisable. Under the present law the board shares the responsibility of establishing discount rates with the directors of the banks in the different districts and has the benefit of their independent judgment. To impose upon the board the sole power of fixing discount rates, as provided in the amendment under consideration, would be a step toward further centralization of authority and any requirement that the rates fixed be uniform throughout the country would be a grave complication which would often render it impossible for the board to do justice to all sections alike, and the board's unanimous opinion is that the establishment of discount rates under such an arbitrary plan would be unscientific and dangerous and would result in the establishment of a higher level of discount rates rather than a lower.

It seems proper to note that Senator HARRIS's amendment does not propose to repeal that part of paragraph (d) of section 14 of the Federal reserve act which authorizes the establishment of rates "graduated or progressed on the basis of the amount of the advances and discount accommodations extended by the Federal reserve bank to the borrowing bank." The progressive rates are not in effect at the present time in any district, and the only Federal reserve banks at which they have ever been applied are the Federal Reserve Banks of Atlanta, St. Louis, Kansas City, and Dallas. Under the terms of this paragraph, as it is proposed to be amended, progressive rates would still be permissible, but if applied at all they would have to be applied by all Federal reserve banks. As a practical matter, even if universally applied, the effect would not be felt nearly as much in the principal financial centers, where there are many banks having very large deposits, and which would consequently have a very large basic line of credit with the Federal reserve bank, as would be the case in the agricultural districts, in which they were formerly applied for a short time. The borrowings of member banks in the larger financial centers from their Federal reserve banks have not at any time been as heavy in proportion to their own capital and surplus and reserve deposits as have been the borrowings of member banks in the agricultural districts of the country from their Federal reserve banks.

For all of these reasons the Federal Reserve Board believes that the proposed amendment is unnecessary and unwise.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

HON. GEORGE P. MCLEAN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. Another amendment was offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], which I hope will not be adopted, although he has suggested an amendment to it which may make it less dangerous. That has not been considered. The Banking and Currency Committee is going to make an investigation of that subject.

As to the question of extravagance in erecting these buildings, we are asked to prevent the letting of any contract of any size, of a thousand dollars or two thousand dollars, without a legislative act.

I will not take the time of the Senate further.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I realize that there is such a scramble for time now that it is embarrassing to take any of it, and I will occupy only a couple of minutes.

There has been a great deal of objection to the original Smith substitute, because it practically directed the President of the United States to do certain things.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has been considered by a good many as a fair amendment, which will bring about the desire which many of us have more speedily than an amendment similar to that of the Senator from South Carolina, and the Senator from South Carolina has been most generous in withdrawing his amendment and asking for the passage of this one.

There is no question, as has been stated, as to the purpose of this amendment. It is to provide for a new member of the Federal Reserve Board, and it is thoroughly understood that that member is to be a farmer, or one representative of agriculture. There is no question about that, and there is no use putting the cards under the table. That is the purpose of it, and we feel that it is right.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator answer a question in my time?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. KING. Could not that be brought about without increasing the size of the board?

Mr. KENYON. Not for some time. It could after a while, but there is a psychology about the whole thing. The condition of the farmer has been spoken of here so much that there is no use going into it now; but, whether justified or not, there is a belief on the part of the farmer that he is not receiving a square deal at the hands of the Federal reserve system. He is not against the system, and no one else is against the system; but with all of these members on the board, two being required under the law to be bankers, how can it be held class legislation if we determine that there shall be a farmer on the board?

If I had time to read the Republican platform of last year, I could cite a declaration in that platform that would sustain this legislation. In his speeches the President has committed himself to the proposition, and has appointed a farmer, or a representative of agriculture, on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and will unquestionably appoint a representative of agriculture on the Federal Reserve Board. It is not going to accomplish a great deal, as the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Connecticut have said. It is not going to remedy all the ills that the farmer is suffering from. It will simply be helpful, and if this Federal reserve system is to be a great superlord of government and a great supergovernment in this country building up this industry, destroying that one, then it is proper that all of the various interests of the country be represented thereon.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have offered several amendments to the bill which I hope may be adopted by the Senate. One is to make the same discount rate to all the regional banks in the United States. Now, they discriminate against the agricultural sections by charging banks in our sections a higher discount rate than banks in the East, and our banks charge higher interest rates to borrowers because of this discrimination.

Another amendment I have offered provides that the discount rate shall not be over 5 per cent, and all regional banks shall charge the same discount rate. I have offered another amendment requiring that before the banks shall spend millions of dollars for the erection of buildings they shall first get the consent of Congress. They have spent more in a few years for these expensive bank buildings than we have spent in 15 years for all the public buildings in the United States. I shall read from Gov. Harding's letter to me showing the returns they are getting on these buildings. That letter I had published in the RECORD on yesterday.

The land, furniture, fixtures, and buildings in New York, erected at an expense of about $22,000,000, nets them, compared with the rental they formerly paid, only about 1½ per cent on the investment. In Philadelphia the building nets them, compared with the rental they were paying before the erection of the new building, less than 1 per cent on the investment.

In Cleveland the building nets them about 2 per cent.

The Pittsburgh branch shows about 1 per cent.

In Richmond it is about one-half of 1 per cent.

In Atlanta it is between 1 and 1½ per cent.

In Nashville it is about 1¼ per cent.

In Chicago it is about 2 per cent.

Government bonds are bringing interest of 4 to 4¼ per cent, and they are just now at par, and yet this banking system is putting up these expensive buildings when the cost of building and materials are high. It would have been far better had they continued paying rent until construction was cheaper. They could have lowered their discount rate had they saved this expense.

Mr. President, I offered an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, to make the Secretary of Agriculture an ex officio member of the board instead of adding another member to the board with expense of salary. He is in touch with agricultural conditions in the country. We have a splendid man as Secretary of Agriculture who has the confidence of us all, and it would have a splendid effect all over the country if he were put on that board.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, again, before we vote upon this measure, I want to call attention to the fact that less than a third of the banks of the United States belong to the Federal reserve system. It was the hope of the founders of the system that they would all come in. Some of the banks which are in now are going out. Other banks are not coming in as they ought to, and the reason is that they are afraid of congressional meddling. It is a great mistake to attack this system without any consideration, and vote to put an extra man on the Federal Reserve Board for the purpose of acting in the interest of a special class.

We have more than 50 governmental bureaus now. They were organized for the purpose of promoting the general welfare, extending equal rights to all and special privileges to none, and now the purpose is to tear down this temple and put up a series of tribal wigwams, the occupants of each wigwam provided with tomahawks and scalping knives to go out and get the best of some other tribe. That is what this kind of legislation leads to.

Mr. President, it is a great mistake, and I move that this bill be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. I assume the Senator means to include all amendments in his motion?

Mr. McLEAN. I mean that all amendments shall be recommitted also.

Mr. NORRIS. What assurance will the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency give to the Senate that the bill will be reported back in some form to the Senate at no distant day?

Mr. McLEAN. There is a bill pending in the House now which would disqualify the Comptroller of the Currency from acting as ex officio member of this board, and if that bill is passed, if the Congress wants to insist on putting a farmer on the board, let it be done without increasing the number. If the number is increased at all, it should be increased to nine; otherwise you will have the board deadlocked at the very time when it will be most unfortunate to the banking system of this country.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the motion of the Senator from Connecticut will be voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 4 o'clock p. m.). The Senator's time has expired. The time for general debate has expired, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to recommit the bill to the committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER], and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I think if present that Senator would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote I would vote "nay." In the absence of the Senator from Vermont I withhold my vote.

So the Senate refused to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KENYON. Let it be stated.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the amendment be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 3, strike out the word "different"; after the word "commercial" strike out the comma and insert the word "and"; after the word "industrial" strike out the comma and insert "interests"; and in line 4, before the word "geographical," insert "of the."

Mr. KING. So it will read how?

The READING CLERK. So that the amendment of the committee will read:

That the first paragraph of section 10 of the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. A Federal Reserve Board is hereby created which shall consist of seven members, including the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall be members ex officio, and five members appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In selecting the five appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board, not more than one of whom shall be selected from any one Federal reserve district, the President shall have due regard to a fair representation of the agricultural, commercial, and industrial interests and of the geographical divisions of the country. The five members of the Federal Reserve Board appointed by the President and confirmed as aforesaid shall devote their entire time to the business of the Federal Reserve Board and shall each receive an annual salary of $12,000, payable monthly, together with actual necessary traveling expenses, and the Comptroller of the Currency, as ex officio member of the Federal Reserve Board, shall, in addition to the salary now paid him as Comptroller of the Currency, receive the sum of $7,000 annually for his services as a member of said board."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. In line 5, after "Secretary of the Treasury," I move to add "the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope that will be voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in view of the statement that I made the other day of the understanding I have that the object of the amendment would be more readily met by the one offered by the Senator from Minnesota, and having that thorough understanding, I withdraw my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question then is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

Mr. MYERS. I offer an amendment to that amendment. I move to strike out the word "eight," in line 4, page 1, and insert the word "seven"; to strike out "six," where it occurs in the amendment, and insert "five"; and to strike out the words "balance of the," at the bottom of page 2, line 25, and insert the word "other"; and to change the word "members," at the top of page 3, line 1, to "member."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1 of the proposed amendment, line 4, strike out "eight" and insert "seven" before the word "members"; in line 6, before the word "members," strike out "six" and insert "five"; on page 2, line 25, strike out the words "balance of the" and insert the word "other"; and at the top of page 3, line 1, strike out "members" and insert "member."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I offered two amendments to the pending bill for consideration, one providing that it be mandatory upon the appointing power to appoint a representative of the manufacturing industry, and the other one that he appoint a representative of organized labor. I introduced these amendments with the idea of giving the Senate an opportunity to vote upon them if the other mandatory provision providing for a representative of agriculture be agreed to. Now that that has been withdrawn, I desire to withdraw my suggested amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Debate has ended according to the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. Debate has ended. A motion to amend may be made, however.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KENYON. Did not the Chair announce that the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

Mr. KENYON and Mr. ASHURST. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my general pair and transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I do not know how he would vote on this question if present. Therefore, I feel compelled to withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I am informed if that Senator were present he would vote as I expect to vote. Therefore, I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who, I am informed, is ill. I do not know how that Senator would vote if he were present, and I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who is absent on official business, is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

I am also requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. ROBINSON. Since announcing my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] I have been informed, and I believe reliably, that if the Senator from West Virginia were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ERNST. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to make the same announcement concerning the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] as on the previous vote, and also to state that if present the Senator from Rhode Island would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is necessarily absent and, as has been stated by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CUR-

TIS], is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK]. If the Senator from Wyoming were present, and were permitted to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], who, were he present and permitted to vote, would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 64, nays 10, as follows:

So Mr. KELLOGG's amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that my amendment to the amendment requiring the consent of Congress to the erection of buildings by the Federal reserve banks may be stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask the Senator from Georgia if he will accept an amendment to his amendment, in line 4 of the amendment, by inserting the words "in excess of $250,000"?

Mr. HARRIS. I will accept that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment it is proposed to insert the following:

The Federal Reserve Board shall have no authority hereafter to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any building of any kind or character, or to authorize the erection of any building in excess of $250,000, without the consent of Congress having previously been given therefor in express terms: Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to any building now under construction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, as perfected, to the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRELD. A parliamentary inquiry. Are we now voting on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] to the amendment.

Mr. HARRELD. As modified?

The VICE PRESIDENT. As perfected.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. BRANDEGEE voted in the affirmative when his name was called.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment is short and I ask that it may again be read, as modified, in order that Senators may understand on what they are voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The roll call is proceeding and may not be interrupted.

The reading clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], but I am unable to secure a transfer of that pair, and, therefore, withhold my vote.

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. Not knowing how that Senator would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and, therefore, withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I find that I am able to transfer my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I make that transfer and vote "yea."

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 33, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. HARRIS to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] as amended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following, after the amendment just agreed to:

SEC. —. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, be amended by adding after the words "being eligible for discount," and before the words "but such definition shall not include," the words "and the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, is an amendment in order to further amend the amendment just agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In line 1 of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] it is proposed to strike out the words "Federal Reserve Board" and insert the words "no Federal reserve bank," and after the word "have" to strike out the word "no," so that, if amended, it will read:

No Federal reserve bank shall have authority hereafter to enter into any contract—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. HEFLIN. The amendment as adopted, as I understood, said that the Federal Reserve Board should not order a bank building constructed. This is just to strike out those words and say that the Federal reserve banks shall not build a bank building?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HEFLIN. It seems to me the amendment ought to say "Federal Reserve Board or Federal reserve bank."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for a division. I think that will be sufficient.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators in favor of the amendment will rise. [A pause.] Senators opposed will rise. [A pause.] It is a tie vote. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, let us have the yeas and nays upon the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. If the Senator from Wyoming were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea" on this question.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—43.

So Mr. LENROOT's amendment to the amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, was agreed to.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I ask that the first line of this amendment just voted on be read. I do not think it is exactly correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. So that the amendment as modified will read:

No Federal reserve bank shall have authority hereafter to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any building—

And so forth.

Mr. HARRELD. That is all right.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add a new section as follows:

SEC. —. That on and after 30 days after the passage of this act a Federal reserve bank shall not charge or receive from a member bank in any transaction a greater rate than 5 per cent, and each rate so fixed shall be the same for every Federal reserve bank.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in the Committee of the Whole as amended in the Senate.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. KENYON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], but I understand that he would vote as I shall vote. Therefore I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Making the same announcement as before as to the absence and pair of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], I desire to announce that if the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] were present and permitted to vote he would vote "yea."

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that my colleague [Mr. STANLEY] if present would vote the same way I have voted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is absent on account of sickness. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] if present would vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to state that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and that if the junior Senator from Mississippi were present and not paired, he would vote "yea" on the passage of the bill.

The result was announced—yeas 63, nays 9, as follows:

So the bill was passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, is amended to read as follows:

SEC. 10. A Federal Reserve Board is hereby created which shall consist of eight members, including the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall be members ex officio, and six members appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In selecting the six appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board, not more than one of whom shall be selected from any one Federal reserve district, the President shall have due regard to a fair representation of the financial, agricultural, industrial, commercial interests and geographical divisions of the country. The six members of the Federal Reserve Board appointed by the President and confirmed as aforesaid shall devote their entire time to the business of the Federal Reserve Board and shall each receive an annual salary of $12,000, payable monthly, together with actual necessary traveling expenses, and the Comptroller of the Currency, as ex officio member of the Federal Reserve Board, shall, in addition to the salary now paid him as Comptroller of the Currency, receive the sum of $7,000 annually for his services as a member of said board.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank. The appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank, except that this restriction shall not apply to a member who has served the full term for which he was appointed. Of the six members thus appointed by the President one shall be designated by the President to serve for 2, one for 4, one for 6, one for 8, and the balance of the members for 10 years, and thereafter each member so appointed shall serve for a term of 10 years, unless sooner removed for cause by the President. Of the six persons thus appointed, one shall be designated by the President as governor and one as vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board. The governor of the Federal Reserve Board, subject to its supervision, shall be the active executive officer. The Secretary of the Treasury may assign offices in the Department of the Treasury for the use of the Federal Reserve Board. Each member of the Federal Reserve Board shall within 15 days after notice of appointment make and subscribe to the oath of office.

The Federal Reserve Board shall have power to levy semiannually upon the Federal reserve banks, in proportion to their capital stock and surplus, an assessment sufficient to pay its estimated expenses and the salaries of its members and employees for the half year succeeding the levying of such assessment, together with any deficit carried forward from the preceding half year.

The first meeting of the Federal Reserve Board shall be held in Washington, D. C., as soon as may be after the passage of this act, at a date to be fixed by the reserve bank organization committee. The Secretary of the Treasury shall be ex officio chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. No member of the Federal Reserve Board shall be an officer or director of any bank, banking institution, trust company, or Federal reserve bank nor hold stock in any bank, banking institution, or trust company; and before entering upon his duties as a member of the Federal Reserve Board he shall certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he has complied with this requirement. Whenever a vacancy shall occur, other than by expiration of term, among the six members of the Federal Reserve Board appointed by the President, as above provided, a successor shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill such vacancy, and when appointed he shall hold office for the unexpired term of the member whose place he is selected to fill.

The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen on the Federal Reserve Board during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire 30 days after the next session of the Senate convenes.

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed as taking away any powers heretofore vested by law in the Secretary of the Treasury which relate to the supervision, management, and control of the Treasury Department and bureaus under such department, and wherever any power vested by this act in the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal reserve agent appears to conflict with the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury, such powers shall be exercised subject to the supervision and control of the Secretary.

The Federal Reserve Board shall annually make a full report of its operations to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall cause the same to be printed for the information of the Congress.

Section 324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be amended so as to read as follows: There shall be in the Department of the Treasury a bureau charged with the execution of all laws passed by Congress relating to the issue and regulation of national currency secured by United States bonds and, under the general supervision of the Federal Reserve Board, of all Federal reserve notes, the chief officer of which bureau shall be called the Comptroller of the Currency and shall perform his duties under the general directions of the Secretary of the Treasury.

No Federal reserve bank shall have authority hereafter to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any building of any kind or character, or to authorize the erection of any building in excess of $250,000, without the consent of Congress having previously been given therefor in express terms: Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to any building now under construction.

REPORT OF JOINT COMMISSION OF AGRICULTURAL INQUIRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House (H. Con. Res. 37), which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 50,000 additional copies of parts 1 and 2 of House Document No. 408, being the report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, in four parts, of which 10,000 shall be for the Senate, 30,000 for the House, 1,000 shall be for the Senate document room, 2,000 for the House document room, and 7,000 for the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry.

Mr. MOSES. I ask that the Senate consider the concurrent resolution at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is before the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. There was an error made in drafting the concurrent resolution as sent to the Senate by the House in the second line, where the word "Document" is used. I move to amend the concurrent resolution by striking out the word "Document" and inserting the word "Report."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOSES. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution

The motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2708) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer without charge certain surplus material of the War Department to the American Relief Administration in Russia, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer, without charge therefor, out of the surplus supplies of the War and other departments of the Government, to American relief organizations to be selected by him, medicines, medical, surgical and hospital supplies, for the relief of the distressed and famine stricken people of Russia, in an amount not to exceed $4,000,000 original cost to the United States and as may be delivered to and accepted by such relief organizations, without cost for transportation to the United States, within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act to authorize the President to transfer certain medical supplies for the relief of the distressed and famine stricken people of Russia."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, Senators will recollect that at the beginning of this session of Congress the Senate passed a bill authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to turn over certain surplus medical stores to the American Relief Administration in Russia. This bill has been amended by the House in three respects. Instead of conferring the authority upon the Secretary of War, the authority is conferred upon the President of the United States. The Senate bill originally did not place any specific limitation upon the cost value of the supplies thus to be turned over. A House amendment puts a limitation of $4,000,000 upon the cost of the supplies. The House also provides that the supplies thus to be turned over shall be turned over within four months.

My idea is that the House has somewhat improved the measure, and I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. McNARY. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on Senate bill 2776.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2776) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Columbia River at a point approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon, to a point on the opposite shore of the State of Washington, which were on page 1, lines 5 and 6, strike out "jointly or separately"; on page 1, line 8, after "approximately" to insert: "5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon,"; on page 1, line 9, strike out "twenty or"; on page 1, line 9, after "twenty-nine" insert: "or thirty"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Columbia River at a point approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon, to a point on the opposite shore in the State of Washington."

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

EUGENE V. DEBS.

Mr. MOSES. I present a letter of the Attorney General to the President of the United States, upon which the President based his commutation of the sentence imposed upon Eugene V. Debs. I move that it be printed as a Senate document.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 18, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 17, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, morning, noon, and night Thou art pouring forth those affections which bestow happiness upon our homes and enlarge the spheres of our usefulness; blessed be Thy excellent name. At Thy touch the nobilities of our natures are moved. O Holy Spirit, stir in every heart and awaken in every breast aspirations that lift toward God and evoke the very best that is in us. O bring all peoples everywhere to a high plane of understanding and self-control. Breathe upon them the spirit of peace and brotherhood. Come forth from the bosom of the Infinite God and hover over our land until all laws and all institutions shall feel Thy presence. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WM. B. HEALEY,
Post Commander,
Diamond City Post, No. 132, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.

WILKES-BARRE, PA., January 6, 1922.

Hon. GEORGE S. GRAHAM,
Philadelphia, Pa.

From: Relief committee.
To: Commander Diamond City Post, No. 132.
Subject: Investigation of Pocono Pines training center.

1. Following complaints from disabled veterans stationed at the Federal vocational school at Pocono Pines on the Pocono Mountains covering a score of alleged irregularities, and at the direction of the commander of Diamond City Post, members of the relief committee on Wednesday afternoon, December 21, 1921, made an inspection of the training center.

2. Greeted by Mr. M. Freedman, the new educational director, the committee was informed that the Government leases a 300-acre tract at Pocono Pines which contains three large buildings and a number of small cottages. Mr. Freedman said that the law prohibits the Veterans' Bureau or the Federal vocational school from owning property, and that it was necessary to lease the tract at a rental of $87,500 a year. On the day of the inspection Mr. Freedman said that there were 212 trainees at the school, showing that the Government pays an average of $412.73 a year to give the trainees shelter and a bed. Mr. Freedman said that the meals were furnished by the National Subsistence Co., of Chicago, but that the dishes and linen are furnished by the Government.

3. After a thorough investigation your committee found conditions in general to be far from the standard that should be maintained in a sanitarium where men who in sacrificing everything for the good of their country are now placed in an effort to recover from pulmonary diseases and stomach ailments received as a result of the war.

4. Your committee indignantly denounces the practice of extracting the large amount of $49 from the pay envelope of every trainee each month to pay for meals and the cleaning of rooms. This is done by the National Subsistence Co. As the meals are of a poor grade and did not appear to be worth one-half of the price charged, and as the rooms have been sadly neglected, we believe that the amount is beyond reason.

5. The men are charged 50 cents a meal, or a total of $45 a month, for board. If a man is sick or misses a meal, no reduction is made in the amount taken from his pay envelope. This money goes to the subsistence company, which corporation, it is said, was organized to feed strike breakers.

The men are also taxed $4 a month for the cleaning of their rooms, but in the majority of instances the rooms are not properly taken care of. This money also goes to National Subsistence Co.

6. The committee is of the opinion that the trainees should be organized and allowed to have their own mess sergeant and take care of the feeding themselves, as is done by the various troops of Pennsylvania State police. It is also of the opinion that instead of paying $4 a month per man for the cleaning of the rooms that each trainee should be held responsible for the condition of his room and that frequent inspections by the officers in charge should be made to see that this is done. In this way the men could save the $4 a month for the cleaning of the rooms and they would get better food, which would cost them less than $1 a day as compared to the $1.50 which they now pay to the subsistence company. If this could not be accomplished the Government should compel the company to serve better food and to reduce the amount of money taken from the men each month from $49 to at least $30, this amount to cover the cost of meals and the cleaning of rooms.

7. Sanitary conditions were found to be in a deplorable state. In the kitchen dishes were being washed in an iron basket which was submerged first in hot water and then in rinsing water. The committee does not believe that this method is thorough enough for a sanitarium, as the water was not twirled to reach every part of the dishes. It was also found that the water in which the dishes were submerged was not continuously flowing and that it was not changed as often as it should have been.

8. The sinks in the kitchen of Pocono Pines Inn were dirty and the stoves on which the victuals were cooked were not as clean as they should have been. In the sleeping quarters cobwebs were found in the corners of the rooms and on mosquito netting over the transom openings above the doors, and insanitary containers were found in the corners of the rooms. The linen used on the table in the dining rooms was of a poor grade and not in the best sanitary condition. It is the opinion of the committee that the linen should be abandoned for sanitary reasons and marble slabs used on the dining-room tables.

9. Exorbitant war prices are being charged at the commissary, which is also conducted by the National Subsistence Co., free of any rental, in a section of the first floor of the Casino. Exorbitant prices are being charged for cigarettes, chewing gum, soda water, razor blades, tooth paste, shaving soap, and other toilet articles.

10. Trainees are being charged 50 cents for a package of Ever Ready razor blades, although a notice on the box reads "Six for 40 cents," and the same blades can be bought in stores in any city in northeastern Pennsylvania at six for 35 cents. Although they preach "cleanliness is next to godliness," a 5-cent bar of soap sells for 8 cents in the commissary. A 5-cent package of chewing gum is sold for 7 cents and a 5-cent bottle of soda water is sold for 7 cents. It has been figured that according to the prices charged for the same articles in stores in northeastern Pennsylvania that the commissary is making from 35 to 40 per cent over and above the regular sales profits. Although it is said that the Subsistence Co. has a contract with the Government stipulating that no other agency or group of men may open a commissary where the association operates, it is the opinion of the committee that the trainees should run their own canteen and that the profits should divert to the mess fund, as was done in the Army during the late war.

11. It is the opinion of your committee that the National Subsistence Co. is reaping an excessive harvest through its contracts with the Government for supplying meals at the training center and in operating the commissary. From each trainee $45 a month is taken for meals, which could be supplied for one-half the price, and $4 a month is taken for the cleaning of the rooms. The profit on meals appears to be beyond comprehension, while the profit on the room-cleaning proposition is also enormous. In one building where 80 men are stationed, the company collects $320 in one month. Out of this the two women are paid about $60 a month, including their board, leaving a profit of approximately $200 a month.

12. No keys have been provided for the locks on the doors in the sleeping quarters of the men, and it was reported by several trainees that suits of clothes and other pieces of wearing apparel had been stolen from their rooms. It is the opinion of the committee that the Government or the owner of the buildings should provide the doors with locks.

13. There are a number of fireplaces in the various buildings, but they were without fires. Fires should be provided during the cold weather, when the temperature is anything but pleasing in the Poconos.

14. There are no reading rooms or games supplied for the men, with the exception of a bowling alley and two pool tables in the Casino. It is the opinion of the committee that the library at the school should be opened and filled with books, where the trainees may spend their time gaining knowledge when not otherwise engaged. The dance hall in the Casino is not fitted with storm shutters, and no matter what amount of heat is applied, the cold blasts from the lakes near by makes the dance hall mighty uncomfortable during the winter months.

15. There are a number of classrooms for the teaching of fundamentals, typewriting, and other classes, and a $60,000 machine shop which is used by several of the trainees. It was reported that courses suitable to a gassed man were not being featured as extensively as they might be. Students in the agricultural class reported that the educational appropriation was almost entirely used up for the erection of the machine shop and that there was not enough money to purchase textbooks or equipment for the course. These men say that recently they paid their own money, together with the instructors, to purchase live fowl and equipment to be used in learning the course. It is the opinion that the appropriation was misused in erecting a machine shop at a school for men suffering from lung and stomach troubles, and with a number of machine shops located in Scranton and Wilkes-Barre where men desiring to learn such a trade should have been sent.

16. In conclusion the committee begs to make the following recommendations which it deems absolutely necessary for the future success of the training center and the welfare of the disabled veterans:

(a) That the feeding of the trainees be taken from the National Subsistence Co.

(b) That the commissary privileges at the training center be taken from said company.

(c) That the men be organized to conduct their own mess and run their own commissary and exchange with the profits being placed into a mess fund.

(d) That the cleaning of the rooms be taken from the subsistence company and each man be held responsible for his own bed and room.

(e) That officers in charge of the school be compelled to make frequent inspections to see that sanitary conditions are enforced.

(f) That new and modern dish-washing machines suitable for a sanitarium be installed in Pocono Pines Inn.

(g) That heating ovens to keep food warm until it is served on the tables be installed in the kitchen.

(h) That marble slabs be used on the dining-room tables instead of table cloths.

17. Unless these or similar recommendations are carried out, the committee believes that the school should be abandoned, as it is a detriment instead of a benefit to the disabled veterans.

Respectfully submitted.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 1771. An act authorizing the Shipping Board to acquire a site on Hazzell Island, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 37. An act granting pensions to certain members of the former Life-Saving Service; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 265.

Resolved, That CHESTER W. TAYLOR, Member of Congress from the sixth district of Arkansas be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs, and that HALLETT SYDNEY WARD, Member of Congress from the first district of North Carolina, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Roads.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Without objection, the resolution is agreed to.

There was no objection.

ANTILYNCHING LEGISLATION.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13, the so-called antilynching bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the antilynching bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, may I ask how much time remains for general debate?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Eight hours and about a couple of minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if agreeable to the committee in charge of the antilynching bill, it is possible that we shall go on with the general debate on the bill and close it to-morrow. That has not been fully determined upon, but I think gentlemen ought to know that that is under consideration.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Wyoming if in the plan that is contemplated it is expected to go further than the conclusion of the general debate in consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I think not. We have an appropriation bill day after to-morrow. That will be disposed of.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does the gentleman from Wyoming have any idea at this time as to how long the appropriation bill which he contemplates bringing up will require?

Mr. MONDELL. It may take the balance of the week. I think we shall not reach the antilynching bill again until next week, possible Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the antilynching bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 29.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because there is no quorum present, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of no quorum. Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees; those in favor of the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the antilynching bill will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 236, nays 105, answered "present" 3, not voting 86, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13, known as the antilynching bill, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the antilynching bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws and to punish the crime of lynching.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend such remarks as I may make in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the discussion of this question three main propositions present themselves: First, the gravity and the extent of the evil which the bill seeks to remedy; second, is congressional action desirable as a matter of public policy? third, will action by Congress be constitutional?

Of the gravity of the evil there can be no question. Lynching is the darkest blot upon an otherwise splendid civilization. Notwithstanding our advancement and our proud position among the nations, this crime prevails only in the United States. In the olden times patriarchs and chiefs had the power of life and death, but it was exercised under crude forms of law or authority. There is only one crime to be compared with lynching, and that is cannibalism. This frightful form of savagery, however, was usually hedged about by ceremonial rites. It was sometimes practiced for the alleviation of hunger; sometimes in pursuance of a general policy to remove the aged or inefficient; frequently in response to a prevalent superstition, that the bodies of those who had been slain returned for retribution upon those who were guilty of taking their lives. It has practically disappeared from the earth, and its presence was always exaggerated. The familiar passage—

> The barbarous Scythian
> Or he that makes his generation messes
> To gorge his appetite—

Was no doubt an imaginative conception of the great dramatist, perhaps suggested by some statements in Herodotus.

This savage practice of lynching or "lynch law" takes its name from one Charles Lynch, who lived between the years 1736 and 1796 in one of the southwesterly counties of Virginia. The town of Lynchburg was named after his brother. He with others in a time of trouble from Tories and lawless persons, during the Revolutionary War, formed a kind of vigilance committee, meting out punishment to offenders. However, they never claimed the right to take life. Castigation, whipping, or something of a similar nature, was the limit of their activities. His actions were justified in resolutions passed by the Virginia Legislature, I believe, in the year 1782.

In the days of early settlement, before the establishment of courts and political organizations, on the frontier and in other places, there may have been an excuse for this method of punishment, as at San Francisco in the early '50's. But even under these circumstances the taking of human life was comparatively light, and at least in certain cases a hearing was had. The vigilantes in the Mountain States and on the Pacific coast went through the form of a trial. In the years from 1850 up to 1860 it is estimated there were 46 Negroes put to death in the United States.

The practice did not become so widely prevalent until after the Civil War. It is a singular fact that down to about 1890 white men and those of other races were thus put to death indiscriminately; since then many more colored persons have been lynched. In the savage form in which this brutal method of execution has been conducted in the last 30 years, neither race nor sex has been spared. Over 500 white men have been lynched, and 57 women have been the victims of the mob; even children have been included. Barbarities which are almost beyond belief have been perpetrated, such as pouring kerosene oil upon the victims and burning them at the stake. These exhibitions have been attended by the frenzy of an infuriated mob, by the cutting of pieces from the bodies of the victims and carrying them away as souvenirs. In one case a lynching was announced and an excursion train was run to the place where the lynching was to occur. Mortifying as these details may be, they are instances of mob violence. They but illustrate the dictum of M. LeBon in his work on The Crowd—that the collective impulse of the mob is different from the impulses and consciousness of those individuals comprising it. When fury is aroused it knows no limit in the brutal actions of a savage assembly.

It is startling to note that in the 28 years from 1890 to 1917, inclusive, the number of deaths by lynching was approximately equal to the number of those electrocuted or hanged under sentences of the courts. Three thousand and thirteen is the number counted for the former and 3,193 of the latter. If full statistics were available it is most probable that the number of those whose lives were taken by lynching was greater than the number of those who were hanged or electrocuted in accordance with the sentences of the courts. In 17 States the number lynched surpassed the number of those put to death by judicial sentence, and in some of those States there were twice, three times, or even four or five times as many who were lynched as those who met death at the hands of the legal executioner.

On this subject of lynching, Abraham Lincoln, in one of his earlier speeches, expressed himself with his usual clearness and in no uncertain tones. In a speech at Springfield, Ill., he said:

I hope I am over wary; but if I am not, there is even now something of ill omen amongst us. I mean the increasing disregard for law which pervades the country—the growing disposition to substitute the wild and furious passions in lieu of the sober judgment of courts, and the worse than savage mobs for the executive ministers of justice. This disposition is awfully fearful in any community, and that it now exists in ours, though grating to our feelings to admit, it would be a violation of truth and an insult to our intelligence to deny.

Omitting a portion of what he said, he continues:

In the Mississippi case they first commenced by hanging the regular gamblers—a set of men certainly not following for a livelihood a very useful or very honest occupation, but one which, so far from being forbidden by the laws, was actually licensed by an act of the legislature passed but a single year before. * * * But you are perhaps ready to ask, What has this to do with the perpetuation of our political institutions? I answer, It has much to do with it. Its direct consequences are, comparatively speaking, but a small evil, and much of its danger consists in the proneness of our minds to regard its direct as its only consequences. Abstractly considered, the hanging of the gamblers at Vicksburg was of but little consequence. They constitute a portion of population that is worse than useless in any community; and their death, if no pernicious example be set by it, is never matter of reasonable regret with anyone.

He then dwelt upon the inevitable destruction of the innocent along with the guilty. He said:

The walls erected for the defense of the persons and property of individuals are trodden down and disregarded. * * * The lawless in spirit are encouraged to become lawless in practice, and thus become absolutely unrestrained. * * * While, on the other hand, good men, men who love tranquillity, who desire to abide by the laws and enjoy their benefits, who would gladly spill their blood in the defense of their country, seeing their property destroyed, their families insulted, and their lives endangered, their persons injured, and seeing nothing in prospect that forebodes a change for the better, become tired of and disgusted with a Government that offers them no protection.

He then adds:

Thus the strongest bulwark of any government may effectually be broken down and destroyed. I mean the attachment of the people.

Is it desirable that Congress should take action? The evil has assumed colossal proportions. Nationhood involves two things—first, the service of the citizen. His life and property must be subject to the call of his country. Our young men must respond to the call to arms, whether for the immediate defense of their firesides or, as they did in recent years, to shed their blood on the soil of France and Belgium. Does the country owe them no return? A nation is not for the benefit of a kaiser or a despot. It is an organized society for the benefit of those who make up its numbers, in which authority must be limited, at least in these modern times of progress, by the rights of the governed, and controlled in accordance with principles of equality and of the protection of the law.

The nation is hardly worthy of the name which does not protect its citizens. On this subject I will read, for those who hold perhaps somewhat different political views from myself, from two Democratic platforms; first, the platform of 1860. This platform contained less than a page, and had but seven sections. One of them is this:

Resolved, That it is the duty of the United States to afford ample and complete protection to all its citizens whether at home or abroad and whether native or foreign.

There was a plank in the Democratic platform so recently as 1916 in no uncertain language:

We again declare the policy that the sacred rights of American citizenship must be preserved at home and abroad. * * *
The American Government should protect American citizens in their rights not only at home but abroad.

On this subject Mr. Justice Matthews said in 118 United States at page 369:

The equal protection of the laws is a pledge of the protection of equal laws.

The principle is laid down that it is the duty of every country to afford protection to all those who have the distinction of its citizenship, whatever their place of birth, whether native or foreign, whatever their religion, whatever their race.

In the most enlightened communities of the ancient world special attention was given to the protection of the citizen. In one of his orations against Verres Cicero, in a passage which I will freely translate, said:

O liberty! O word once delightful to every Roman ear! O sacred privilege of Roman citizenship, once sacred, now trampled upon.

But the offender in that case was only a tyro in comparison with those who make up the modern lynching mob. He added the words:

Facinus est vincire civem Romanum; scelus verberare.
"It is a wicked action to bind a Roman citizen. It is a crime to scourge him."

The declaration of the Democratic platform and those principles of nationality which I have mentioned are of universal application among free peoples. They are as well the badge of stable government, of the supremacy of law and order. These principles have been the very essence of our policy from the beginning. The most striking feature of both the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States and its amendments is equality, the right to life, liberty, and property, the absence of all discrimination. These are great American ideas, and without their enforcement our Government does not fulfill the promise of its founders or the hopes of the present.

Whatever our views of State rights may be, we must recognize that under present-day conditions in the solution of national questions State boundaries are becoming vanishing traces on the map. I count myself as one who deplores that tendency. It seems to me every State should have initiative, that everything should be done to promote its dignity, its pride, and independent action; but in our effort to seek to restrain Federal jurisdiction we are fighting against the tide. The boundary line between the States and National Government is something that is beyond our control. The change is due to social development, to science and invention, and rests upon the closer relations of trade and amity that exist between communities.

I would not detract one iota from the fame of Webster as a statesman and a lawyer, but he was a powerful protagonist swimming with the tide when he made the reply to Hayne in January, 1830. Canals had been built, railroads were building. 14 years later the magnetic telegraph was brought into practical application, disseminating news all over the country, and as a result of these developments the States were brought as near one to the other as had been counties in the administration of Thomas Jefferson. But for this development, that magnificent expression of his, "Liberty and Union now and forever one and inseparable," might have been the dream of an idealist. We must face the conditions as they are. The growth of Federal jurisdiction is very much accentuated not merely by interstate relations but by the limitations and occasional inefficiency of State governments. You are all familiar with the great array of statutes placed on the Federal statute books within the last 30 years—the antitrust law, and before that the interstate commerce law, laws for the inspection of meat; pure food laws, laws giving remedy to employees of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and recently a law has been passed under which theft from freight trains engaged in interstate commerce can be punished in the Federal courts. Then we have very recently an act named for our distinguished colleague, the Mann white slave act, and the Adamson law, which go to the very verge. All these indicate change of jurisdiction and change of conditions. Measures which would have been regarded as utterly unconstitutional 100 years ago have been approved by practically a unanimous decision.

I may say in this connection that it is hardly fair for a State to have the benefit or stimulus of congressional appropriations for rivers and harbors, for good roads, and all the forms of national activity which are so helpful to localities, and, on the other hand, to say if we have any water power we must confine it within our own borders; that, however much the landscape may show the beneficent effect of Federal activity, we still adhere to the right to control our own matters in the old way whether they be obsolete or not.

Popular opinion, if I can judge correctly, favors this bill. I am placing in the RECORD numerous quotations from newspapers. It causes me some regret that several clippings reflect on Members of this House, but I take it, my brethren, that you have all been accustomed to newspaper criticism, and if you have not been the probability is if you attain any considerable prominence you will be subjected to it in the future, and so I trust that these expressions will not be offensive to you. I am including, for the most part, those that have been printed within the last two months:

[Editorial on Dyer antilynching bill from New York World, Jan. 8, 1922.]

THEY HAVE GIVEN AWAY THEIR CASE.

Opposition to the antilynching bill is having hard sledding in Congress. That is not because it has no case in constitutional law and precedent. It has a perfect case under a long line of Supreme Court judgments concerning the scope of section 1 of the fourteenth amendment, on which the bill depends for its validity.

But the bill in its new invasion of the police powers of the States happens to affect the South more than any other section of the country, and southern Representatives in Congress are in the worst position of all to crowd any argument now in defense of State police powers.

The most deadly blow ever struck at those residuary rights and powers of the States since the beginning of the Government is the eighteenth amendment, and for that fact the South and its Representatives at Washington are most of all responsible. They cared nothing then for State police power and all that. The more completely it was destroyed and merged in the General Government so far as prohibition was concerned, the better they were suited. They turned their backs on the most fundamental principles for which they and their political predecessors had stood since the time of Jefferson and went bag and baggage over to a position that even the traditional party of centralization would have repudiated as unthinkable hardly half a dozen years ago.

And now they are loudly talking State police power against a little antilynching bill whose whittling-down invasion of State jurisdiction is not comparable for a moment with that effected by the eighteenth amendment. It is to laugh, and this no doubt explains the great good nature with which the Republican side of the House listens to the southern protests and then votes them down.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Jan. 6, 1922.]

THE ANTILYNCH BILL.

Sixty-three or sixty-four men and women were lynched in the United States last year. The count varies slightly. Well over 4,000 have been lynched since definite enumeration began in 1885. More than 60 of last year's victims were murdered by mobs in Southern States.

It was with such shocking figures as these in mind that the authors of the antilynching bill, now pending in the National House, went about their task of framing Federal legislation to guarantee to citizens the equal protection of law which has, in effect, been denied them by some of the States. The proposal is assailed on constitutional grounds. To the American sense of justice and fair play, however, it appeals more strongly than does a legalistic quibble over the right of the National Government to take the step recommended.

The bill is before the House with the indorsement of the Judiciary Committee. The minority of the committee dissents. This minority, it is interesting to note, is composed of Representative SUMNERS of Texas, whose State was guilty of 7 lynchings last year; MONTAGUE, of Virginia, in which State 1 lynching occurred; WISE, of Georgia—Georgia mobs murdered 11 in 1921; TILLMAN, of Arkansas—6 Arkansans were mob victims; and DOMINICK, of South Carolina, representing a State guilty of 5 mob murders last year.

Congressmen still pretending faith in the old State's right doctrine argue that the passage of such a measure as this would constitute an indefensible invasion by the Federal Government of the police power of the States. The decisions, however, seem to be against this contention. The question of constitutionality aside, it will appear to fair-minded people generally that when States fail signally to afford their citizens the protection of law guaranteed them by the Constitution there can be no great injustice done when the National Government steps in to supply the deficiency. The best way to prevent such an "invasion" would be for the States to stop evading their own duty in respect to this crime which every year blackens the fame of America.

Every newspaper reader is familiar with the fact that from time to time the National Government is obliged to make the humiliating confession that it is powerless to make good its express constitutional guaranty that no one shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Files of the State Department show many such confessions in the form of official communications with Governments abroad. Compensation for the lynching of aliens by American mobs has run into hundreds of thousands of dollars. The United States can pay after the damage is done, but under existing law it can not prevent the damage.

Reduced to its simplest terms, the antilynching bill proposes to permit the Federal Government to give to individuals the protection of law which the States can not or refuse to give—a protection of law guaranteed alike by the Federal Constitution and by most of the State constitutions. If anyone can read into such a suggestion a threat to destroy or impair our form of government he is welcome to his interpretation, but the country is not impressed by it.

TO MAKE AN END OF LYNCHING.

Federal interference with the police powers of the States has its dangers. But the antilynching bill now before Congress has abundant justification in spite of the protests of southern Members against it. This measure provides for the punishment of local officials who fail to do all in their power to prevent a lynching and of all participants in lynching mobs; and it makes any county in which a lynching takes place liable in the sum of $10,000 to the family of the victim. Such legislation should strike at the very root of the evil. Immunity from punishment is the most potent stimulant of mob violence.

The right of the Federal Government to act is founded upon the fourteenth amendment. "No State," the Constitution there declares, "shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

This assertion of the supremacy of the Federal law is fundamental to the very existence of the Constitution, since without such supremacy we should be a confederation of States and not a Nation. It is especially important that the protection of the citizen from unconstitutional acts should be insisted upon at this time, when disregard of constitutional principles has become alarmingly prevalent.

Clearly, the State that can not, or will not, protect its citizens against a mob has failed to secure them in their constitutional rights and has given the Federal Government complete justification for exerting its authority in the matter. That the mob spirit has too often run riot with little effort on the part of local officials to check it is undeniable. Acts injurious to the good name of the Nation have thus been committed with no punishment of the offenders. More than once these acts have led to embarrassing international episodes, as in the famous case of the Italians murdered in New Orleans. The Federal Government is necessarily the only authority other nations recognize. To confess that it has no authority when crimes against the citizens of other nations are committed puts it in a humiliating position.

Public sentiment will undoubtedly be behind any measure that ends an organized defiance of law, such as lynching is. The principle of holding the jurisdiction in which it occurs financially liable is a sound one; it has already been accepted in State statutes. That it is the duty of the State to punish lynchers goes without saying. This duty should be left to the State so long as there is any guaranty that it will be performed. But a State which can not protect its own citizens and enforce the constitutional guaranties must not complain if the Federal authorities step in. Mob violence has disgraced the Nation long enough.

ANTILYNCHING LAW.

Public sentiment should rally in support of the Dyer antilynching bill which has been introduced in the House. It is time that the Federal Government should take cognizance of these atrocities. In many of our Southern States the authorities are patently unable to cope with the situation. Aside from the fact that the frequent lynchings give foreigners an unfavorable opinion of our civilization, they constitute in themselves an evil which every right-minded man, both North and South, deplores. A man is entitled to trial before a jury whether his flesh be white, black, or yellow.

[Editorial on the Dyer antilynching bill from Indianapolis (Ind.) Star, Dec. 20, 1921.]

A BILL TO CHECK LYNCHING.

The Dyer bill to prevent lynching now pending in the House of Representatives seems to be a measure that if made into a law would have excellent results. It seems useless to look to properly repressive action by the legislatures of Southern States. The governor of Georgia who went out of office last year was a far-seeing man and did his best to get a regulative State law through, and had he remained in office would probably have succeeded, but his successor has other ideas, and unless a Federal law is enacted lynching in Georgia will go unchecked.

The Dyer bill in the House provides that in the failure of State authorities to protect persons against mob violence, the county within whose borders the offense occurred shall be subject to a penalty of $10,000 for every lynching. The making of these crimes a Federal offense will put a different face on the matter. The lawless element—which is often found among the "best citizens"—may continue for a time to be lawless, but public sentiment among taxpayers will force local authorities to arrest the leaders, whose identity is usually no great secret, and to discourage in every way the perpetration of the "great American crime" and relic of barbarism. It will not be difficult after a few penalties have been exacted by Federal authorities to get State laws through to punish the criminals. Punishment may not change the brutal nature of the men who make up murderous mobs, but will have a tendency to prevent them from pursuing their favorite sport.

Lynching is a crime that does much to offset our proud claims to a high civilization. It goes on constantly, and, according to all appearances, with a tendency to hang or shoot or burn men for minor as well as serious offenses, as often unproved as not. Negroes, being helpless, are most often the victims, but white men are not immune from mob law. The Dyer bill or one even more stringent should become a law without delay.

[From the Post, Boston, Mass., Dec. 18, 1921.]

LET US END THIS DISGRACE.

For more years than we would care to reckon these United States have been disgraced by an offense against law and order that seems to be peculiarly American. This offense is that of putting to death without trial men suspected or known to be guilty of certain crimes. The outrages almost always occur in the Southern States and with as much regularity are directed at men whose skins are black. Whites are rarely given the same kind of punishment, even for the same kind of crime. Illegal hangings, shootings, and burnings at the stake are, therefore, to be considered a matter of race revenge, one of the worst manifestations that we can have in such a land as ours.

Ever and anon this crime has arisen to plague us. When we protest, officially or unofficially, at some outrage in Europe, the reply is that we would better clean our own skirts before criticizing others. President Wilson made this plain enough on more than one occasion, and, previous to his time at the White House, Theodore Roosevelt fulminated against the vicious thing with all the energy at his command. But to no avail; the years went on with scarcely any let-up in the number of persons illegally put to death.

At last it seems as if we might wake up, however, for there is now up for consideration by the National House a bill to "assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching." It is the first definite attempt we have noted to stop the practice.

This measure asserts, first, that if a State or a governmental subdivision of it fails or refuses to protect the lives of persons "against a mob or riotous assemblage," it may be deemed to have denied the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, and Congress may therefore provide penalties. These are, as proposed by the bill, to make it a felony for a local official to refuse to "make all reasonable efforts" to perform his duty in preventing a lynching; to make it a felony to participate in "any mob or riotous assemblage by which a person is put to death"; and to make each county in which anyone is lynched liable in the amount of $10,000, to be paid to that person's family, or, if he has none, "for the use of the United States."

Some theorists have always asserted that a Federal law against lynching would be unconstitutional. As this one is drawn it seems to avoid that objection. Certainly something should be found binding upon States that either do not punish lynching at all or punish it very gently. The custom has disgraced this country too long already. Let us end it.

[From the Boston (Mass.) Post, Dec. 29, 1921.]

WHY NOT CONSTITUTIONAL?

It is expected at Washington that the antilynching bill, whose passage by the Republican majority in the House last week was delayed, will be brought up again soon after the holiday recess. According to the partisan alignment in that body, there can be no question as to its passage if the Republican ranks can be kept unimpaired. As the figures stand, there are now 300 Republicans, 1 Socialist, and 131 Democrats—more than a 2-to-1 majority.

Opposition to this bill is, however, developing in the majority party, based upon its alleged unconstitutionality. Its enemies criticize, for instance, the provision that a State which does not afford full protection to the victim of a lynching party shall pay $10,000 to his surviving relatives. This, they hold, is illegally infringing State rights.

But why is a bill to punish lynching unconstitutional? It seems to the Post that the Constitution not only fully warrants, but demands such a measure. The fourteenth amendment says, "Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Now, lynching is certainly taking life "without due process of law," and a man who is lynched is as certainly denied "the equal protection of the laws." Furthermore, "Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article."

An antilynching law is, therefore, legislation to see that a human-rights amendment to the Constitution is respected. It surely should be as valid as is legislation to enforce the amendment that tells men what they may not drink.

[From the Bulletin, Philadelphia, Pa., Dec. 21, 1921.]

STATES' RIGHTS INCONSISTENCY.

The arguments advanced by southern Congressmen against the constitutionality of the antilynching bill at one time would have commended themselves to most Americans as sound. Lynching is a national disgrace and an especial reproach to the States that tolerate it, but the Dyer bill, which declares participation in a lynching and the failure of State officials to protect from mob violence persons under their jurisdiction to be crimes against Federal law, as well as imposing a $10,000 fine on the counties in which a lynching takes place, goes far afield from old-fashioned notions of the limits of Federal jurisdiction.

However, these protests against an extension of Federal jurisdiction to cover lynching will have a hollow sound, coming from a section in which every State has indorsed recently a far more extensive encroachment on the reserved police powers of the States. For men who accepted without protest the eighteenth amendment to cavil at a much less radical extension of Federal power may be explained by the peculiar sensitiveness the South displays on questions involving the race issue, but it is no credit to their sense of logic.

[From the Philadelphia Evening Ledger, Dec. 21, 1921.]

WHY DEFEND LYNCHERS?

Debate on the proposed antilynching law will be resumed in Congress after the holidays, and there is no good reason why the measure should not be passed without delay.

Lynching in itself is a great evil that leads to greater ones. It encourages mob spirit in politics and it must result inevitably in the peculiar sort of mania that led to the shameful scandal of the new Ku Klux. There is no imaginable good that mob law can accomplish. And it is a matter of record that at least 50 per cent of the victims of lynching parties have been innocent of wrong.

There is wisdom behind the effort to enact a Federal law under which counties in which mob rule is permitted to progress to a point where life is sacrificed be compelled to pay heavy indemnity to the family of the victim. Such a provision ought to be a valuable stimulus to the public officials who are either too cowardly or too careless to protect prisoners committed to their care.

[From the Literary Digest for Dec. 31, 1921.]

A FEDERAL BILL TO HALT LYNCHING.

Lynching will be less fashionable if the Federal antilynching bill sponsored by Representative DYER (Rep.), of Missouri, becomes a law. Also, notes a southern paper, the Columbia Record, "chicken-livered and rabbit-hearted officers of the law, with backbones no stiffer than empty flour sacks," will be dealt with rather severely if they continue to surrender prisoners and jail keys as in the past, for heavy penalties to both the officer and the county he represents will result if every precaution is not taken to prevent the lynching of a prisoner, white or black. "The Dyer bill is drastic, but a drastic remedy is needed for the loathsome lynching disease," declares the New York Tribune, which reminds us that "since January 1, 1921, there have been 60 known lynchings, a record of shame for a civilized nation." Moreover, another editor recalls, "the records of the past 30 years show that more than one-fifth of the 3,224 victims of lynchings in that time were white men." Southerners, therefore, should not feel that the Dyer bill is aimed wholly at them, points out the Manchester (N. H.) Union, for, as the New York Globe remarks, "both northerners and southerners have offended and both whites and blacks have been lynched."

In the opinion of Attorney General Daugherty the passage of legislation by Congress penalizing failure by a State to give equal protection of the laws to any person within its jurisdiction would be constitutional.

* * * * * * *

Some States, it is said, such as Minnesota and Illinois, already have enacted drastic laws against lynching, and have provided severe penalties for officers and communities that fail to protect the life of the accused. Should the Dyer bill pass, however, the Federal court, rather than a local tribunal, will institute proceedings should a sheriff or deputy be charged with neglect of duty. That it is practically impossible in most cases for State officers to deal with mobs bent upon lynching is the contention of the San Antonio Express:

"Since April 11 last 38 lynchings, including 2 burnings at the stake and 4 burnings of bodies after lynching, have been perpetrated in the United States, as follows: Georgia, 10; Mississippi, 7; South Carolina, 5; Louisiana, 4; Arkansas, 3; and Texas, 3. Meanwhile, the 1920 record stands as the basis of indictment and comparison—and Texas heads that record. Last year its mobs outlynched Georgia's.

"However sincere and courageous the southern governors' efforts to stamp out lynching, they come to naught. In the lynching States spoken and written appeals to the spirit of civilization and Americanism, to lawful government and order, have encountered but eyes closed against them, mind fast shut against them, ears deaf to them.

"Congress, however, has both the right and the power to legislate for the genuine, effective operation of every mandate of the Constitution; it should pass the Dyer antilynching bill."

"If under the Dyer bill communities are made to pay for tolerating lynchings, lynchings will stop," asserts the New York Tribune; "if officials can be imprisoned for not doing their best to discourage mob violence, local sentiment will turn against such outbreaks." Meanwhile, adds this paper:

"No State can well complain if Congress takes a hand in ending the lynching evil. Our foreign relations have been troubled many times by the lawless hanging of other nationals. The Federal Government is bound under treaties to give equal protection to citizens and aliens. Yet it has no hold on the States through whose negligence aliens are lynched, and punishment for such crime is not exacted. It is likewise an affront to the Constitution that citizens of the United States are not protected by the States in their personal rights."

"As long as mob law maintains its hold in America the life of no individual is safe, be he rich or poor, high or low," points out the Houston Informer. Therefore, contends the New York Globe:

"No argument should be necessary in defense of this bill, which is a clear and direct application of the constitutional provision that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Lynching can not ordinarily take place without the connivance of the local authorities. If they will not act, the Federal Government should. To call this assertion of the constitutional rights of every citizen a violation of State sovereignty is to deny 60 years of history."

"To reenforce State statutes by such Federal provisions as are contained in the Dyer bill will impose no injustice upon anyone, but will maintain equal rights for all," believes the Boston Herald, and the Detroit News remarks that "by this time it ought to be realized that the lynching spirit leads to more trouble than it can possibly correct."

[From the Telegram, Utica, N. Y., Dec. 21, 1921.]

LYNCHING.

At last a serious attempt is being made by the United States Congress to wipe out what is considered to be the blackest stain upon the escutcheon of this country. That a barbaric institution, which lynching really is, should have any standing whatsoever in this land of liberty, where every citizen is in possession of the right of equal protection by the law according to the Constitution, is indeed hardly credible. The foreigners who come to visit us are astounded to hear that such cruelties are perpetrated here which savor more of the savage practices of the primitive people in the jungles of Africa or the massacring mobs in certain sections of Europe. * * * Even the officials in the places where lynching has been recognized by tradition make little effort to apprehend those who are guilty of the heinous practice, and the new bill aims to punish any officer who makes no "reasonable effort" to discharge his duty and protect human beings from the violence of mob rule. The bill provides for a penalty which will be imposed upon the county in which any lynching occurs. The sum of $10,000 will be paid to the family of the one who has thus been violated or to the United States in case he has no relatives. It is expected that this measure will act as a preventive against the crime.

It is true that the country has been too lenient with lynching parties. The institution has become so well ingrained in the minds of the peoples in those sections of the country where the act is quite prevalent that it is considered well-nigh impossible to do anything to stop it. Even now some are rather inclined to believe that the enactment of the statute will in no way remedy the evil. There is too much determination, there is too much heat engendered when the mob is moved into action, that any resistance would probably cause greater opposition, they declare. But the Government should not be daunted by the threatened violation of the law, if it goes into effect. The force of public opinion generally throughout the country is bitterly incensed against lynching. It has no justification. The conscience of man revolts against it. The country has seen slavery go out of existence. Lynching must follow in due course. The Government, if it has any raison d'être, must above all put that force into operation which should protect its citizens and give them a fair trial.

[From Union, Springfield, Mass, Dec. 24, 1921.]

THE ANTILYNCHING BILL.

Owing to a successful filibuster by Democrats in the House of Representatives the Dyer antilynching bill has been laid away until after Christmas. While this means only a short postponement of action, it shows a Democratic inclination to beat the bill at any cost. This sort of thing may be a polite compliment to the gentlemen from the South who see in its passage an insult to their constituencies, but if the bill is finally defeated one of the sore spots on the American body politic will remain unhealed.

Americans, who are naturally inclined toward national self-righteousness, not without cause, have been frequently irked by references on the part of Europeans to southern lynchings. Such references are particularly unpleasant because founded on undeniable facts, and it has been evident that the South could not be relied upon to put a stop to lynchings or to punish the offenders after they had taken place. In the interest of our national pride and honor it is necessary for America, against whose name such things are held, to prevent their occurrence, if possible.

Democratic Representatives from the South feel, perhaps, that if they do not do everything in their power to prevent the passage of the bill, they will be charged by their constituents with having allowed the Nation to rebuke the States in which lynchings are too lightly regarded. That would mean political ruin for them, and their good friends and fellow partisans from other States naturally sympathize with them in their hour of trial. Northern Democratic Congressmen should remember, however, that they can not vote against the honor of America with the same impunity allowed their southern colleagues.

There are other editorials of the same import in the New York Times, New York Evening Post, and Springfield Republican. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] has included a large number which were published at an earlier date. I will read briefly an editorial from the New York World, which I think would be considered by my colleagues as the leading Democratic paper of the country:

Opposition to the antilynching bill is having hard sledding in Congress. This is not because it has no case in constitutional law and precedent. It has a perfect case under a long line of Supreme Court judgments concerning the scope of section 1 of the fourteenth amendment, on which the bill depends for its validity.

Then follows a bit of good-natured chaffing about the part that southern Members had in the passage of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act. [Laughter and applause.]

There is almost an equal number of editorials in southern newspapers. My friend the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] a few days ago made a most eloquent quotation from Henry W. Grady. I join in admiration for that exemplar of the new South, but has the gentleman from Maine recognized that when Grady was editor of the Atlanta Constitution, from 1880 to 1889, there was a stinging editorial against lynching and that the paper from that day to this, in season and out of season, has been condemning the lynching habit.

LAWLESSNESS IN GEORGIA.

A few days ago two prisoners in the hands of authorities in Menominee, Mich., were forcibly taken charge of by a party of lawless persons, dragged nearly a mile with ropes fastened around their necks, and finally hanged upon a tree by the light of their burning dwellings. We had intended to enlarge upon this exhibition of lawlessness in a Republican stronghold, where civilization is supposed to be at its highest, and give the organs a dose of their own medicine, but circumstances over which we have no control will prevent.

These circumstances are that a few nights ago a band of lawless persons entered the town of Blakely, in this State, and proceeded to the jail, demanded the keys from the jailer, and shot to death the Negro who was serving a term for stealing a hog. This is worse than the Michigan crime and is utterly without excuse or defense. It is stated that the Negro had made threats against the lives of several persons, but if he had threatened the life of every individual in the State, the crime of those who shot him would be nothing less than cold-blooded, cowardly murder.

It is not stated that these assassins were disguised, and it is to be hoped that the jailer can identify them and that he will have grit enough to cause them to be arrested. If he had taken the precaution to fire his pistol in the air when those cowardly wretches made their appearance at the jail, the unfortunate Negro would not have been murdered. As it is, the citizens of Early County will have to be responsible for the state of affairs which permits a gang of cowardly desperadoes to outrage the law by murdering a Negro who was in jail and who was utterly powerless to harm anyone, no matter what threats he might have made. We hope to see a strenuous effort made to bring the assassins to justice. In the whole history of crime in this country we know of nothing more cowardly than the murdering of this Negro.

[Editorial on the Dyer antilynching bill from Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution, Dec. 22, 1921.]

THE ANTILYNCHING BILL.

The Dyer bill, now in the House, will probably go over the holiday recess as unfinished business.

The chances are in favor of its enactment, although the bill may be defeated by the argument that it is drastic and unnecessary. If it is defeated that argument alone will be responsible for it.

No one can doubt the necessity of an awakening of public conscience against the barbarous and inhuman practice of lynching.

For years just such legislation as this has been in prospect; and during all of that time the Constitution, while urging the discontinuance of the lynching evil, has repeatedly prophesied that if the States did not themselves put an end to mob law it was only a question of time until the Federal Government would assume jurisdiction and do exactly what is contemplated by the Dyer bill.

* * * * * * *

If the antilynching bill is not passed now, it certainly will be later on unless lynching is discontinued.

All of the arguments and pleading against it will be lost in the fact that the evil continues, and the only possible way to prevent such legislation is to remove the cause for it by substituting law and order for mob violence.

It is certain that this Government is not going to put itself in the position of condoning mob law nor of sanctioning the blot on its escutcheon occasioned by the practice of mobs putting human beings to death in defiance of the courts and the institutions of the law.

LUST FOR BLOOD.

"In the lynching States," remarks the New York Herald, commenting editorially upon the latest demonstration of mob violence in Mississippi, "lust for blood is the spirit of the lawless."

The circumstances attending that gruesome piece of outlawry tend to justify the Herald's conclusion.

"Ordinarily," as our contemporary argues, "a lynching mob in Mississippi or any of the other States which compete in lawlessness takes action at one of three times—when the accused is captured, when he is being taken to jail, or after he has been jailed and awaits trial."

But in this instance "the mob at Tylertown was of a more enterprising sort. It broke into the courtroom in which the accused was being tried, roped him, dragged him through the streets, and at the end of a spectacular parade hanged and shot him.

"Here was a case in which the prisoner was actually on trial.

"A special term of court had been called expressly to dispose of his case; there was no reasonable possibility of his escape, no danger of legal delay.

"The alleged culprit was being tried for a crime the penalty of which is death under the Mississippi law, so it would naturally follow that if his guilt could be proven society would quickly be rid of his presence; otherwise no right-thinking and humane citizen would want his life destroyed.

"But the mob smelled blood. Its passion would not be stayed.

"It battered down the doors of its own 'temple of justice' in its frenzied clamor for a human life.

"Not only the judge but even the husband of the complaining witness implored the would-be lynchers to let the trial proceed; not to interfere with the orderly operating processes of the constitutional law.

"But justice was brushed aside.

"Respect for the law was trampled under foot. Is it true that 'in the lynching States lust for blood is the spirit of the lawless?'"

NO EXCUSE—EVER.

In the dark history of mob madness in America there have been few more deplorable events than the recent occurrence at Lexington, Ky.

Lynch law, foiled this time in its grapple with constituted authority, has nevertheless taken once more its inevitable toll of blood, hate, and disorder.

There can be no excuse for lynch law—ever.

* * * * * * *

Even were lynching the deterrent which only the misguided hold it to be, it would still be eternally inexcusable. It is the foulest and most certain means of destroying respect for the majesty of the law. It is the sort of treason which undermines governments and civilizations from within.

The spirit of the mob is always the spirit of pure lawlessness. Witness the turn it took in Lexington. Foiled in the attempt to take the prisoner, says the reports, the mob dispersed in small groups and looted pawnshops and hardware stores for firearms. If they could not be self-constituted executioners they would be thieves and pistol toters.

Lynching and pistol toting. They go hand in hand. And they must be stamped out in America, regardless of the price—even such a price as was paid in Lexington.

Let it be repeated:

There can be no excuse for lynch law—ever.

GEORGIA STILL LEADS.

* * * * * * *

For years the Constitution has been engaged in an effort to arouse a sentiment in this State that would stamp out lynching and mob violence.

The time was when lynching was resorted to as punishment for only one offense, and when it was most exceptional that a lynching occurred for any other than that one cause.

Whenever there was a lynching for that cause those who conducted it took the position that it would never be resorted to for any other.

The Constitution then expressed a warning that if mob law were tolerated in any instance and for any cause, it would surely spread and that it would eventually get beyond bounds; that it was only a step from lynching for that one type of crime to mob law for less heinous offenses.

Our prediction has come true, as is shown by the fact that of the 18 lynchings that occurred in this State last year only a small proportion of the number bore any relation whatever to the offenses for which lynching was ever accorded any measure of justification.

Now we find lynching resorted to as punishment for even robbery and petty crime.

Either the public sentiment of Georgia must put an end to lynching and restore universal power and authority of law or else mob law is going to pull down the civilization of this State.

Time and again the Constitution has sounded the warning that if the State does not meet its obligations in this respect the Federal Government will step in and do the work itself, because no State in the Union is going to be permitted thus to blacken the national escutcheon.

The worst feature of the lynching record of Georgia is that every year it grows worse and the State seems to be helpless.

Again we appeal to the better people of Georgia to waken.

THE ANTILYNCHING BILL.

We regret very much to see southerners opposing the antilynching bill now before Congress. We are as great a stickler for State rights as any of them, but surely no one will claim that it is the right of a State to permit murder. We would not have the Federal Government take charge of the enforcement of criminal laws in the States, but this is a case where the States are unable to enforce the law as it should be enforced and the Federal Government would be better able to enforce it. We therefore believe this matter should be handed over to Federal jurisdiction.

The law would still be enforced by the people of the State in which a lynching occurred, but not by the people of the community in which it occurred. When a man is accused of a crime in Florida, for instance, he must be tried in the county in which the crime was perpetrated. Of course, a change of venue may be granted if good reason for it is shown, but this is rarely if ever done by the prosecution. It is not infrequently done by the defense. A man charged with crime may be tried in another county than the one in which the crime was perpetrated if he can show that, because of prejudice against him in the county, he could not get a fair trial there. But the State never claims that any county is so prejudiced in favor of lawlessness that a conviction is impossible or even improbable in it even if the accused is guilty.

It is true that there are counties in every State where public sympathy shields the criminals. But there is no State or Federal district in a State where the public sympathy is so depraved. In addition to this, the jurors living in a county in which a lynching occurs would be apt to be intimidated in the discharge of their duty. They would know that the members of the mob that did its work secretly were still unknown. They would feel that men who had taken the law into their hands to lynch a man would take it into their hands again to defend each other, and the result is that the jury, no matter how much its members might be opposed to lynching and in favor of an impartial execution of the laws, would be afraid to convict. We think an arrangement that would take this fear out of the consideration of the case would be a good one.

The Federal courts are not held in every county nor are the jurors who try cases in them always citizens of the county in which they are tried. Jurors selected from all parts of the southern district of Florida would not be afraid to convict a man tried in Jacksonville. Few, if any, of them would be from the county in which the lynching occurred. The chances of justice and law enforcement would be greatly improved by trying the case beyond the influence of local environment.

The crime of lynching is not as frequent now as it was a few years ago, but it has not been diminished by the conviction of lynchers. They escape punishment as things are, and this justifies and, in fact, calls for a change.

[Editorial on the Dyer antilynching bill from Albany (Ga.) Herald, Nov. 18, 1921.]

THE ANTILYNCHING BILL.

Representative DYER, a Republican Congressman from Missouri, has introduced a bill designed to put a stop to lynchings in this country. The bill provides heavy penalties for persons participating in mob violence and for officers of the law who, through dereliction of duty, fail to prevent lynchings. It also requires that any county in which a lynching occurs shall forfeit $10,000.

While this measure may not have the effect of stopping lynchings entirely and immediately, its enforcement would unquestionably go a long way in that direction and might eventually reduce the number of lynchings in the country to negligible proportions. The penalty imposed upon counties in which lynchings occur would certainly not only have a restraining effect but would naturally lead to the exercise of a positive moral influence against mob violence. Once a county had to pay a forfeit of $10,000 for permitting a lynching within its borders, county officials and citizens generally would become more alert, and lynchings would no longer be tolerated or passed over lightly.

There is some very decided opposition being urged to the Dyer bill on the ground that it would infringe on State rights and would be unconstitutional. This objection is sound in principle, but as eminent an authority as Attorney General Daugherty has expressed the opinion that the bill would be constitutional, and he is quoted as having recommended its passage. Representative DYER has stated that no action will be taken on his bill this session but that its passage will be urged early in the regular session of Congress.

[San Antonio (Tex.) Express, Jan. 2, 1922.]

"TO WORK OUT THEIR OWN PROBLEMS"—WHEN?

In the Literary Digest's comprehensive presentation of the newspaper and congressional case for and against the Dyer lynching bill this line is conspicuous:

"Representative POU, of North Carolina, asks that southern people 'be left alone to work out their own problems.'"

May not the Express remind the Hon. EDWARD W. POU that, as a matter of grim record, this is the problem of 42 out of 48 States—of every State save Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Utah, and Vermont? And but for the patriotic heroism of a little group of officers in Barnstable County jail on August 18, 1921, Massachusetts's name would be missing from that painfully short but distinguished list. Indeed, faithfully and courageously to guard against and to punish for mob violence is the problem of every American community in every State.

Representative POU should reflect that for many a long year the southern people have been left alone to work out this terrific problem. And so generally have they failed or refused to work it out that, since 1884, in the 15 so-called lynching States there have been 2,982 mob murders! Seventy-five of these were in North Carolina—the second best record of the lot. Four hundred and thirty-nine of them were in Georgia—the worst record.

What has Congressman POU to suggest constructively by way of "working out"?

Consider how his own State's government has failed—not refused—to work out the problem in all these years.

Consider how honestly and strikingly the last preceding governor, Thomas W. Bickett, sought to work it out with National Guard, sheriffs, and citizen posses as his forces.

Consider that during his four-year term there were nine lynchings in the State, and it kept out of the annual lynching record only one year of the four.

Consider how in December, 1920, Goldsboro citizens and officers successfully defended six Negroes in the Wayne County courthouse, and shot down the leader of the attacking mob.

Consider that since Mr. Bickett left office 12 months ago, North Carolina, under Gov. Cameron Morrison, has four more lynchings to show for its "working out" of the problem.

Consider that North Carolina in 37 years has had but 5 lynchless years.

And in all this time, including the Bickett administration, how many lynch murderers has North Carolina sent to prison or the gallows?

Surely Representative POU will not deny that this is the practical way to render the "problem" less.

Consider, too, that other "lynching States" of comparatively good antilynching records under their present governors—Kentucky under Edwin P. Morrow, and South Carolina under Robert A. Cooper—both appear in the 1921 lynching statistics, Kentucky with one mob murder and South Carolina with five.

The Express does not believe that the Dyer Act would be as impotent as similar State laws—lacking brave and honest enforcement—to prevent lynching or at least to punish lynchers and the communities that tolerate them. Certainly it does not believe that the Dyer Act would "increase the number of lynchings," as Representative ASWELL, of Louisiana, argues.

The problem, of course, is one of juries and prosecutors.

In writing "brave and honest enforcement" the Express has in mind, not governors of the type above named, but peace officers charged wth protecting prisoners and public prosecutors, grand juries, and trial juries.

This newspaper does not believe that from all the area of a southern Federal judicial district a grand jury that would indict and a trial jury that would convict such heinous violators of the National Constitution and statute as are lynchers can not be had. It does not believe that the Federal Department of Justice also is made of "chicken-livered and rabbit-hearted officers of the law with backbones no stiffer than empty flour sacks," to quote the Columbia (S. C.) Record.

While reluctantly admitting that the southern white people generally have not worked out this problem and—despite all hammering by their editors and preachers, their academic educators and some of their governors—show no dependable intention to work it out, the Express will not admit that the spirit of anarchy and cowardice are so rife among them that such a law as the Dyer Act would go unenforced at the hands of any Federal judicial establishment south of "the line." Pass the Dyer bill.

[From the Bristol (Va.) Courier, Jan. 2, 1919.]

A DISGRACEFUL RECORD.

Lynchings in the United States during the year 1918 show an increase of about 60 per cent over the number occurring in 1917. There were 38 lynchings in 1917 and 62 in 1918, the increase being 24. Fifty-eight of those put to death were Negroes and 4 were white persons, and among the victims were 5 women. These are the facts and figures compiled by Tuskegee Institute, at Tuskegee, Ala.

Lynchings formerly were provoked by assaults by Negroes on white women, and there was a disposition to excuse the mob. Judge Lynch was thus encouraged to extend his jurisdiction, and statistics for recent years have shown that he is gradually doing that. He presumes now to usurp the functions of the courts in the punishment of all kinds and degrees of crimes, and he no longer draws the color line.

The lynchings in 1918, according to the records made up at Tuskegee, were for murder; for alleged complicity in murder; for threats to kill; for assault; for attempted assault; for alleged participation in a fight over an alleged hog stealing; for killing an officer of the law; for assisting a man charged with murder to escape; for robbing a house and frightening women; for killing a man in a dispute about automobile repairs; for killing a landlord in a dispute over a farm contract; for assault with intent to murder; for wounding another; for robbery and resisting arrest. Only 16 of the lynchings were for assault or attempted assault on women. Many of the crimes charged against the victims of the mobs were not punishable with death under the law, while some of them were only punishable with jail sentences or fines.

It was a disgraceful record Judge Lynch was permitted to make in 1918, and there is no assurance that he will not be permitted to make a still more disgraceful record during the present year. Fifty-seven—4 of them white men and 5 women—62 people in all—were denied their day in court and put to death by mobs. Many of these people had not committed capital crimes, while some of them were innocent of any crime. If possible, every member of every one of these mobs should have been brought to judgment in the courts they defied, but so far as known no effort has been made to apprehend any of the lynchers. It may be that the Federal Government, realizing that State authorities will not uphold the law against the mob, will eventually take steps to enforce the clause of the Federal Constitution which provides that no person shall be deprived of life or liberty without due process of law.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. I am compelled to refuse to yield. I hope that when I am through with my argument proper I may be able to yield to some questions, but at the present I must decline.

The women of Atlanta, Ga., in a recent gathering, of which there is an account in the New York Times of September 10, 1921, passed resolutions condemning lynching in the strongest language. Among other resolutions which I shall insert in the RECORD there is the following:

We are convinced that if there is any crime more dangerous than another, it is that crime which strikes at the root of and undermines constituted authority, breaks all laws and restraints of civilization, substitutes mob violence and masked irresponsibility for established justice, and deprives society of a sense of protection against barbarism.

[From the New York Times, Sept. 10, 1921.]

SOUTHERN WOMEN FIGHT LYNCHING—COMMITTEE IN ATLANTA FINDS NO EXTENUATION FOR CRIME OR MOB VIOLENCE—DENY IT PROTECTS THEM—THEY POINT OUT IT HITS CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY AND ASK FOR ONE STANDARD OF MORALS.

(Special to the New York Times.)

ATLANTA, GA., September 9.

"We find in our hearts no extenuation for crime, be it violation of womanhood, mob violence, or the illegal taking of human life," declares a statement just issued by a special section of the Georgia State Committee on Interracial Cooperation, composed entirely of women, which has just been organized here to banish all groups which would take into their own hands the execution of justice and to set up a single standard of morals both in the white and the colored races.

This appeal condemns the protection of womanhood by criminal methods, asserting "if there is any crime more dangerous than another, it is that crime that strikes at the root of and undermines constituted authority, breaks all laws and restraints of civilization, substitutes mob violence and masked irresponsibility for established justice, and deprives society of a sense of protection against barbarism."

Resolutions adopted at the organization meeting outline the scope of the committee's activities and acknowledge the responsibility of sharing with all good citizens "the duty of emphasizing and perpetuating the ideals of our fathers in the founding of this Commonwealth in wisdom, justice, and moderation."

Then follows the appeal to the public at large to uphold public officials in the discharge of their duties, "to recognize the forces which are undermining our life, and speedily to banish self-constituted groups and agencies which presume to usurp authority, set aside the dignity of the law, and constitute themselves the prosecutors, jurors, judges, and executors of suspected criminals."

"We have a deep sense of appreciation for the chivalry of men who would give their lives for the purity and safety of women," they declare. "Yet we feel constrained to declare our convictions concerning the methods sometimes employed in this supposed protection. We find in our hearts no extenuation for crime, be it violation of womanhood, mob violence, or the illegal taking of human life.

"We are convinced that if there is any one crime more dangerous than another, it is that crime which strikes at the root of and undermines constituted authority, breaks all laws and restraints of civilization, substitutes mob violence and masked irresponsibility for established justice, and deprives society of a sense of protection against barbarism.

"Therefore we believe that no more false appeal can be made to southern manhood than that mob violence is necessary for the protection of womanhood, or that the brutal practice of lynching and burning of human beings is an expression of chivalry. We believe that these methods are no protection to anything or anybody, but that they jeopardize every right and every security that we possess.

"The double standard of morals which society passively permits is rapidly producing results that imperil the future integrity of our national life, and we are persuaded that this problem can never be solved as long as there is a double standard for men and women of any race. We appeal for the creation of a public sentiment which will no longer submit to this condition and declare ourselves for the protection of womanhood of whatever race.

"We are convinced that if there is ever to be a solution of the race problem there must be an intensive and sustained campaign to instruct whites and Negroes to respect both moral and civil law. Therefore we recommend that all people give themselves to a definite study of these vital matters relating to justice and righteousness, and that the press, pulpit, platform, and school endeavor to lead public thought in bringing about a state of public opinion that will compel the protection of the purity of both races."

Among the women in the newly organized body are: Mrs. A. W. Lawton, of Savannah, who is chairman of the special woman's section; Mrs. W. A. Turner, of Newnan, secretary; Mrs. Samuel M. Inman, Mrs. Emily McDougall, Mrs. J. H. McEachern, Mrs. Beaumont Davison, Miss Rosa Woodberry, Mrs. C. N. Downey, Mrs. W. A. Albright, Mrs. W. Frank Smith, Mrs. Archibald Davis, Mrs. M. Ashby Jones, Mrs. H. C. Phipps, of Atlanta; Mrs. W. J. Neel, of Cartersville; Mrs. Z. I. Fitzpatrick, of Thomasville; Mrs. C. C. Hinton, of Macon; Mrs. T. J. Woofter, of Athens; Mrs. Hazen Smith, of La Grange; and Mrs. Luke Johnson, of Griffin.

Similar resolutions have been passed by the white women of Alabama and in a meeting at Memphis, in Tennessee. They expressly declared that for the most terrible crime for which lynching is sometimes practiced that custom is not necessary, and I might say that it is a delusion that assault upon women has been the cause of the larger number of lynchings in recent years. Some estimates are even as low as 20 per cent for the proportion of the victims guilty of this crime.

There remains to be considered the question as to the validity or constitutionality of the bill. I can not do otherwise than admit that grave doubts have arisen upon this subject, that there have been numerous decisions in which not only expressions obiter but decisions of the court upon questions submitted have seemed to deny the application of the fourteenth amendment to conditions justifying the passage of this bill. Let me read from the fourteenth amendment the portions applicable to this subject:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

It will be noticed that prior to this declaration citizenship in the States was the primary consideration and citizenship in the Nation was secondary, derivative as it were from citizenship in the States. This amendment in that regard makes a sweeping change:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

In the fifth section there is the provision that the Congress shall have the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the article.

On this subject I wish to say, after the most mature consideration, after listening to persons who first thought that this bill lacked constitutionality but who have on further consideration changed their minds, that there is a basis for it in the Constitution, that the evil is so pressing that we ought to pass this measure modified somewhat—I would omit that section about the liability of counties through which a victim is carried—and present it to the tribunal of last resort.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. I regret that I can not yield. I have already declined. If this is not a remedy, let us find some other. It is an appalling record when in State after State lynchings exceed legal executions by two, three, and four, and five times. Can a man have the proud boast, "I am an American citizen," a distinction which should be as great as civis Romanus sum, when, if he is sent by the Government of the United States into a State or goes there or is born there, the Government says, "I may call upon you for your life, if necessary, but when it comes to protection it must come from the State in which you live"? If there is prejudice against Jew or Greek, against Italian or Negro, if there is a sentiment that they should be driven out or hanged on the slightest provocation, the United States Government says, "We will not protect you." Think of the incongruity—that is not a strong enough word—the absurdity of this position. We can protect with our whole Navy, with bristling guns, a citizen of the United States in China or in Asia Minor. The whole Nation is rocked if an outrage is perpetrated upon a citizen in those places, but almost within sight of this Capitol a man might be lynched, and those who oppose this bill would say that the Federal Government is utterly powerless, that it can do nothing to remedy the wrong or to punish the perpetrators.

Decisions are sometimes overruled. For years the Dred Scott decision denied to the colored man the position of a citizen, almost that of a human being, but it was overturned by the courts, and we came to a new era. Abraham Lincoln said that the right to abolish slavery or regulate it rested entirely in the States, but in an emergency—that of war—in September of 1862, he issued a proclamation—the same man who had said that slavery was a local question—which struck the shackles from millions of human beings. The Attorney General of the United States after careful and elaborate attention has said that this bill will pass the tests of the courts. His able assistant, Mr. Goff, the Assistant Attorney General, has filed an elaborate brief to the same effect.

I now desire to take up, and I think in all fairness I should do so, the cases, or the leading ones, which militate against the validity of this bill, and after I have done that I shall point out that in those very decisions there are qualifying expressions which greatly diminish the force of them.

The first is the so-called Slaughterhouse cases. In the mind of the average citizen these cases have something to do with slaughterhouses at Chicago—with Swift or Armour—but that is not the case at all. It arose under a statute passed by the State of Louisiana, giving to a corporation in three parishes the exclusive right to provide a landing place for cattle and establish slaughterhouses and places for slaughter. The independent butchers arose in arms and said the statute deprived them of their equal rights. The law provided that by the 1st of June following all other slaughterhouses should be closed. The case was taken to the Supreme Court, and, mind you, it was a decision of five against four—Chief Justice Chase, Justice Field, Justice Bradley, and Justice Swayne dissented—and yet it is upon that case that the main reliance is placed by many lawyers for limiting the scope of the fourteenth amendment; and in this connection I want to say that we should not depend entirely on the fourteenth amendment. There are great principles written, as with a pen of iron, in the Constitution and through the whole history of our policy, which are quite as potent as arguments for legislation for the protection of life and property as anything in the fourteenth amendment. In this case, in Sixteenth Wallace, the supremacy of the States within their sphere was still maintained, notwithstanding the fourteenth amendment.

The next was the Cruikshank case (92 U. S., p. 542), in a decision upon an indictment under the sections of the so-called enforcement act of May 31, 1870. It said:

The people of the United States, resident within a State, are subject to two Governments, one State and the other National.

The jurisdiction of the State was maintained. As I shall point out, the force of this decision was somewhat modified by what Chief Justice Waite said on the subject. There was also objection that the indictments were too vague and uncertain.

The principle was laid down in the Civil Rights cases (100 U. S., p. 3), that the object of the fourteenth amendment was corrective rather than direct; that its object was to correct action taken by the States in the passage or enforcement of laws. Such was its scope rather than a direct mandate to the States or their citizens.

The same view was expressed in Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 319).

The Harris case (106 U. S.) had to do with the taking away of a prisoner from a sheriff. In James v. Bowman (190 U. S., 127) it was decided, Justice Brown and Justice Harlan dissenting, that Congress has no general power to punish bribery at elections. Justice Brewer sought to place limits on the application of the fifteenth amendment and also the fourteenth. In the Hodges case (203 U. S., 1) it was decided that when a contract was made between certain colored men and a lumber company, and performance was prevented by acts of violence, such acts of violence were not punishable under the United States statutes.

Again (254 U. S.) it was held, Justice Clarke dissenting, that those who had taken part in deportation of certain miners were not punishable.

It must be constantly borne in mind in examining these decisions that some were based on defective indictments, some on the fact that the indictments were responsive to the wrong statute, and that in many cases that which was said was not at all necessary in the decision in the case under consideration. Of course, I should say in passing, that the scope of the amendment was regarded as much larger by some contemporary writers. Mr. Blaine said that the earlier decisions of the Supreme Court deprived the fourteenth amendment of much of the power which Congress intended to impart to it, and the Members of Congress sincerely believed it possessed a far greater scope than the decisions given.

Then again, Prof. Burgess, a writer of very high standing, in his commentaries on political and constitutional law, said:

From whatever point of view I regard the opinion of the court in the Slaughterhouse cases—from the historical, political, or juristic—it appears to me to have thrown away the great gain in the domain of civil liberty won by the terrible exertions of the Nation in the appeal to arms. I have perfect confidence that the day will come when it will be seen to be intensely reactionary and will be overturned.

Mr. William D. Guthrie, a leading member of the New York bar, in a work on the fourteenth amendment, in speaking of the applicability of the first eight amendments to the States, says:

It is, however, important to bear in mind that this great question has yet to be squarely decided by the Supreme Court in some case properly raising the point and fully presenting it in connection with the intention of the framers of the fourteenth amendment. * * * When the proper case arises, the question ought to be treated as still open, and we may hope that the inestimable and priceless individual rights guaranteed by the first eight amendments will, in the main at least, be held to be beyond the power of any State to abridge or deny.

Let us consider expressions in the decisions cited favorable to the validity of the pending bill, first in the Slaughterhouse cases. The real basis of the decision is found in this clause in the syllabus:

The Parliament of Great Britain and the State legislatures of this country have always exercised the power of granting exclusive rights when they were necessary and proper to effectuate a purpose which had in view the public good, and the power here exercised is of that class and has until now never been denied. Such power is not forbidden by the thirteenth article of amendment and by the first section of the fourteenth article. * * *

This shows clearly the basis of the decision.

The following is what is said, not in the opinion but in the syllabus:

The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States are those which arise out of the nature and essential character of the National Government, the provisions of its Constitution, or its laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof; and it is these which are placed under the protection of Congress by this clause of the fourteenth amendment.

It is not necessary to inquire here into the full force of the clause forbidding a State to enforce any law which deprives a person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, for that phrase has been often the subject of judicial construction, and is, under no admissible view of it, applicable to the present case.

This expression clearly excludes the interpretation which has been placed upon this decision.

And again, on page 81, in even clearer language, Justice Miller says, in treating of the fourteenth amendment:

If, however, the States did not conform their laws to its requirements, then by the fifth section of the article of amendment Congress was authorized to enforce it by suitable legislation.

Mr. Justice Field, in his dissenting opinion, stated that if the amendment did not accomplish more than the majority opinion held it did, that it was a vain and idle enactment, which accomplished nothing, and most unnecessarily excited Congress and the people on its passage.

Mr. Justice Bradley called attention in these words clearly to the fact that there might be punishment for delinquency as well as for affirmative action:

The protection of the citizen in the enjoyment of his fundamental privileges and immunities—except where a citizen of one State went into another State—was largely left to State laws and State courts, where they will still continue to be left unless actually invaded by the unconstitutional acts or delinquency of the State governments themselves.

This clearly conveys the idea that failure to act alike with positive action gives Congress jurisdiction.

I wish to call attention to the vital fact that there is a wide difference between lynching and an ordinary crime of murder committed by an individual for motives of hate, revenge, or in the commission of the crime of robbery. Punishment in such cases is naturally and properly within the State courts. As I shall endeavor to show in the future, that which this law seeks to prevent is of an entirely different character.

In the Cruikshank case (92 U. S., pp. 552, 553), in the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Waite, involving the right of the people peaceably to assemble, he said:

The right of the people peaceably to assemble for the purpose of petitioning Congress for a redress of grievances, or for anything else connected with the powers or duties of the National Government, is an attribute of national citizenship, and, as such, under the protection of and guaranteed by the United States. The very idea of a government republican in form implies a right on the part of its citizens to meet peaceably for consultation in respect to public affairs and to petition for a redress of grievances. If it had been alleged in these counts that the object of the defendants was to prevent a meeting for such a purpose, the case would have been within the statute and within the scope of the sovereignty of the United States. Such, however, is not the case. The offense, as stated in the indictment, will be made out if it be shown that the object of the conspiracy was to prevent a meeting for any lawful purpose whatever.

The importance of this quotation is that it recognizes several ideas which have an important bearing on the right to pass this measure:

First, the recognition of certain so-called fundamental or natural rights as within the scope of Federal authority.

Second, that these rights are under the protection of and guaranteed by the United States.

Third, that if the indictment had set forth pertinent facts, the United States courts would have had jurisdiction.

On the following page Chief Justice Waite says:

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guaranty against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society.

This is to the same effect as his statements on a preceding page.

Mr. Justice Bradley, in First Woods Circuit Court Reports, page 314, in passing upon the Cruikshank case in the court below, said:

It is undoubtedly a sound proposition that whenever a right is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States Congress has the power to provide for its enforcement, either by implication arising from the correlative duty of Government to protect, wherever a right to the citizen is conferred, or under the general power (contained in Art. I, sec. 8, par. 18) "to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or any department or officer thereof."

And on page 315 he said:

It seems to be firmly established by the unanimous opinion of the judges in the above-quoted case that Congress has power to enforce by appropriate legislation every right and privilege given or guaranteed by the Constitution. The method of enforcement, or the legislation appropriate to that end, will depend upon the character of the right conferred. It may be by the establishment of regulations for attaining the object of the right, the imposition of penalties for its violation, or the institution of judicial procedure for its vindication when assailed or when ignored by the State courts, or it may be by all of these together. One method of enforcement may be applicable to one fundamental right and not applicable to another.

In the Civil Rights case, One hundred and ninth United States, which is one of the strongest cases against the bill, Mr. Justice Bradley, on page 23, says something which applies directly:

Many wrongs may be obnoxious to the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment which are not, in any just sense, incidents or elements of slavery. Such, for example, would be the taking of private property without due process of law, or allowing persons who have committed crimes (horse stealing, for example) to be seized and hung by the posse comitatus without regular trial, or denying to any person, or class of persons, the right to pursue any peaceful avocations allowed to others.

If the seizing and hanging of a horse thief is obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment, is there not a basis for legislation such as is here proposed?

I now come to cases which are altogether favorable to this class of legislation.

In One hundred United States, pages 310 and 311, the case of Strauder against West Virginia, it is held that rights and immunities can be protected by Congress. I read:

A right or an immunity, whether created by the Constitution or only guaranteed by it, even without any express delegation of power, may be protected by Congress. Prigg v. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania (16 Pet., 539). So in United States v. Reese (92 U. S., 214) it was said by the Chief Justice of this court: "Rights and immunities created by or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States can be protected by Congress. The form and manner of the protection may be such as Congress in the legitimate exercise of its legislative discretion shall provide. These may be varied to meet the necessities of the particular right to be protected."

It is a singular fact that the fourteenth amendment has been invoked not for life so much, not for liberty so much, but has constantly been made effective for the protection of property, the property rights of corporations, and general property rights. In Ex parte Virginia Justice Strong says in regard to the powers of Congress under the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment:

All of the amendments derive much of their force from this latter provision. It is not said the judicial power of the General Government shall extend to enforcing the prohibitions and to protecting the rights and immunities guaranteed. It is not said that branch of the Government shall be authorized to declare void any action of a State in violation of the prohibitions. It is the power of Congress which has been enlarged. Congress is authorized to enforce the prohibitions by appropriate legislation. Some legislation is contemplated to make the amendments fully effective. Whatever legislation is appropriate—that is, adapted to carry out the objects the amendments have in view—whatever tends to enforce submission to the prohibitions they contain, and to secure to all persons the enjoyment of perfect equality of civil rights and the equal protection of the laws against State denial or invasion, if not prohibited, is brought within the domain of congressional power.

Since I have it before me, I will read a part of the opinion in this same case pertaining to another portion of this bill. Many Members of the House have made a distinction between that part which operates upon the mob made up of individuals and that part which operates upon the agents of the State, considering the latter as of more approved validity. I am not sure that the difference is so vital. This portion of the opinion is in regard to a State acting by its agents. It is found on pages 346 and 347:

I read:

We have said the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment are addressed to the States. They are, "No State shall make or enforce a law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, * * * nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." They have reference to actions of the political body denominated a State, by whatever instruments or in whatever modes that action may be taken. A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

That applies to sheriffs and peace officers. I read further:

Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State. This must be so or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or to evade it.

The very able gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] in some remarks not long ago referred to what he called the Burney case, in One hundred and ninety-third United States. More correctly it should be the Barney case, to the effect that the State is not responsible for the action of one of its officials. Familiarity with later decisions of the court shows that this case has been expressly overruled. In the case of the Home Telephone & Telegraph Co. against the city of Los Angeles it was held—

Under the fourteenth amendment the Federal judicial power can redress the wrong done by a State officer misusing the authority of the State with which he is clothed. Under such circumstances inquiry whether the State has authorized the wrong is irrelevant.

Then it goes on to say that if he has the semblance of authority——

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. BURTON. I regret I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BURTON. I see I shall hardly have time in which to read from other decisions which may be regarded as favorable. I had intended to read the very clear statement of Mr. Justice Matthews in Yick Wo v. Hopkins (118 U. S., 356, 373), and also from the so-called Logan case (144 U. S., 293), where it is said:

Yet that every right, created by, arising under, or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States, may be protected and enforced by Congress by such means and in such manner as Congress, in the exercise of the correlative duty of protection, or of the legislative powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, may in its discretion deem most eligible and best adapted to attain the object.

Some cases of important bearing upon the constitutionality of this act were presented by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] in an able though somewhat hurried review of the cases in a recent argument.

I wish to take up now, however, some cases in which the power of the Federal Government has been asserted by the Supreme Court in the strongest language.

In the case under the Mann Act of Hoke against United States, in Two hundred and twenty-seventh United States, page 308, the court said:

We are one people, and the powers reserved to the States and those conferred on the Nation are adapted to be exercised, whether independently or concurrently, to promote the general welfare, material and moral.

That is the note of the more recent decision; but there are statements in the Debs case that are even stronger than that in their assertion of the Federal power. It is said in the syllabus of that case, in One hundred and fifty-eighth United States, page 564—this is the broad, comprehensive assertion:

The Government of the United States has jurisdiction over every foot of soil within its territory, and acts directly upon each citizen.

Again, the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Brewer, on page 578, says, quoting from Chief Justice Marshall:

The Government of the Union, then, is emphatically and truly, a Government of the people. In form and in substance it emanates from them. Its powers are to be granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them and for their benefit.

No trace is to be found in the Constitution of an intention to create a dependence of the Government of the Union on those of the States for the execution of the great powers assigned to it. Its means are adapted to its ends, and on those means alone was it expected to rely for the accomplishment of its ends. To impose on it the necessity of resorting to means which it can not control, which another government may furnish or withhold—and that is this case; another government might refuse to punish these crimes—would render its course precarious, the results of its measures uncertain, and create a dependence upon other governments which might disappoint its most important designs and is incompatible with the language of the Constitution.

He then quotes from Chief Justice Chase (7 Wall., 71, 76):

Both the States and the United States existed before the Constitution. The people, through that instrument, established a more perfect union by substituting a National Government, acting with ample power directly upon the citizens, instead of the confederate government, which acted with powers greatly restricted, only upon the States.

Then from Mr. Justice Bradley:

We hold it to be an incontrovertible principle that the Government of the United States may by means of physical force, exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil the powers and functions that belong to it. This necessarily involves the power to command obedience to its laws, and hence the power to keep the peace to that extent.

Now, it might be said that this decision was based upon the interstate commerce powers of Congress; but Mr. Justice Brewer says, on page 584:

We do not care to place our decision upon this ground alone. Every Government, intrusted, by the very terms of its being, with powers and duties to be exercised and discharged for the general welfare—has a right to apply to its own courts for any proper assistance in the exercise of the one and the discharge of the other, and it is no sufficient answer to its appeal to one of those courts that it has no pecuniary interest in the matter. The obligations which it is under to promote the interest of all and to prevent the wrongdoing of one resulting in injury to the general welfare, is often of itself sufficient to give it a standing in court.

How about lynching?—

In conclusion, I wish to refer to the one point to which the attention of this House should be directed. The strongest argument for this bill is one which has received only scant attention. Lynching is not the ordinary case of the exercise of the police power. It is not the ordinary case of murder or of robbery. It is anarchy.

Let me call attention to the language of the bill in its first section, which some may have overlooked:

That the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage," when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

It does not intend to take in all cases, but it does say that no State shall abdicate its functions and give over the punishment of an actual or supposed crime to the frenzy of a mob. The Constitution says the trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment shall be by jury. That provision has even been applied to Alaska under the terms of the treaty joining Alaska to this country, and by a very strong minority of the court was held to be applicable to the Philippines—namely, that jury trial could not be refused there. It has certainly been applied throughout the States. If a man is deprived of a trial by jury, or if there is any informality, even if partiality is exercised in the selection of the panel, the conviction is overturned promptly, if not by the State court, then by the Federal court.

But what have you here? The usurpation in well toward half the States of the Union of the right to punish crime by the mob, going sometimes even into the temple of justice itself where the culprit is on trial, taking him away from the sheriff, seizing him in the presence of the judge and the jury, and taking him out to certain death. Now, do you mean to say to me that the National Government does not have the power to enforce that provision of trial by jury where it is disregarded on so large a scale? Is that provision of the Constitution for trial by jury a mere vanishing shadow without substance? Does the right of trial by jury and its assertion in the Constitution "keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope"? Thus, you see, this is different from the ordinary cases that have been before the Supreme Court and is to be distinguished from many decisions which lay down the principles of interpretation of the Constitution and of the fourteenth amendment. But, my friends, this is a crying evil, and we can not afford to continue without action.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; I will now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman says that it is a crying evil. Nobody deprecates lynching more than the people of the South, and I want to ask the gentleman this question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me ask the gentleman this question: A Negro in a certain town in my State watched a white girl, clerk in a hotel, knowing that she had to go home in the dark hours of the night. He waylaid her, stuck a pistol in her face, dragged her into a secluded spot and raped her repeatedly during the night. Her clothes were nearly torn off her, but before daylight she escaped and made her way back, and the white men, of course, rushed to her rescue.

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman is making rather a lengthy question.

Mr. RANKIN. Well, I want to ask the gentleman what punishment would he recommend for that Negro?

Mr. BURTON. Trial in a State or United States court, and probably hanging would be none too bad for him.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; but I want to tell the gentleman that under the laws of Ohio the highest possible punishment he would get would be 20 years in the State penitentiary.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, well, we will take care of the cases and matters of that kind in Ohio.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio, concurring in all that he has said about the horror of lynching, does he believe that the Federal court in a State could be more effective than the State court in Ohio in dealing with an offense of that character?

Mr. BURTON. Possibly not in Ohio, although we have had lynchings in Ohio, but as a general rule the Federal jury is gathered not like a State jury from the immediate locality but from a much wider area, and that is referred to as an advantage even in decisions of the Supreme Court, and a Federal jury would be more likely to convict than a jury in a State court. The gentleman from New York knows that many times a defendant who is guilty has been convicted in the United States court who never would have been convicted in the State courts at all.

Mr. COCKRAN. I can not say that that is within the range of my experience. But is it not equally true that in the State courts where an impartial verdict is doubtful there is the power of the State court to order a change of venue?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; but, as everyone knows, that is a very inadequate remedy in the administration of justice.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Usually the change of venue is not granted on the application of the Government; it is to the defendant.

Mr. COCKRAN. That is because the defendant suffers from prejudice; but it is equally within the power of the court to grant change of venue to the Government.

Mr. BURTON. Let me say that the question of the gentleman from Mississippi involves something in which I do not concur at all, and that is the justification of lynching. I commend to the gentleman the resolution of these ladies in Atlanta. I can conceive of no condition of society where mob law is justified in trampling under foot men's rights; where it has justified the brutality and the disregard of all law that is involved in lynching. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman recognizes, of course, that Henry W. Grady and these women in Atlanta join the attitude of the people of the South with reference to lynching, but that does not mean that they believe that it is wise to do the thing that is contemplated here.

Mr. BURTON. The ladies of Atlanta, as I understand, and the Atlanta Constitution certainly, while they regret the tendency toward United States jurisdiction, say that it is inevitable.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; if the people do not do it.

Mr. BURTON. They have not done it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Statistics which have been introduced here show 112 lynchings in a year, and notwithstanding the increase in population of this country they have been reduced to 63 in the last year. In view of this public opinion, does not the gentleman believe that it is going to extremes in having the Federal Government intervene?

Mr. BURTON. But the public opinion has not progressed far enough.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But will you destroy the public opinion by having the Federal Government assume jurisdiction in these cases?

Mr. BURTON. The question is, Does it exist in a sufficient volume and strength to be destroyed? There have been laws, but they have disregarded them, and when the legislatures have passed laws the mob has gone out and done its work. I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. The gentleman has gone most fully into the constitutionality of the law and has referred to other portions of the Constitution. I would ask the gentleman if Article IV of the Constitution does not give authority, perhaps, for this bill.

Mr. BURTON. This is one of the amendments. The first eight amendments to the Constitution have been very generally regarded as a bill of rights. They were adopted in the year 1791, and are regarded as practically a part of the original Constitution. In repeated decisions, one from the gentleman's own State—Smith against the State, in Howard's Reports—it was held that these provisions of the Constitution apply to the Central Government rather than to the States. That is the question about which Mr. Guthrie said the decision should be made by the court of last resort. I would say they have a bearing, but I do not think that we can depend upon them.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. In the second section of the bill we find that it has been rested on a certain clause of the fourteenth amendment, and the bill provides that where there is a lynching in any State and it is proved that the State has been guilty of denying to its citizens the equal protection of the law, certain action shall be taken by the Federal Government. Therefore the bill contemplates nothing but being based upon one section of the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. BURTON. That I leave to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and the other gentlemen on the committee to discuss with the gentleman from Maine. I am not responsible for the phraseology. Very likely some modification might be made.

Mr. HERSEY. In the State of Ohio, with which the gentleman perhaps is more familiar than any other State, does the State of Ohio deny to its citizens the equal protection of the law?

Mr. BURTON. Once in a while a mob in the State does.

Mr. HERSEY. I am asking the gentleman whether the State of Ohio denies to its citizens to-day the equal protection of its laws?

Mr. BURTON. Whenever lynching becomes prevalent, whenever, as I have pointed out again and again, more persons go on the route to death by lynching than they do by legal execution, that State is denying the equal protection of the laws. [Applause.]

Mr. HERSEY. When have they had a lynching in Ohio?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, it is some time since we have had one. We have had but one and the State of Maine has had but one of late years.

Mr. HERSEY. During the past year has the State of Ohio denied to any of its citizens equal protection of the laws?

Mr. BURTON. I know cases have been brought to my attention where the claim has been made that it has, although there have been no lynchings. There are only six States in the Union that can claim exemption from lynching. There is Connecticut—although one suicide there was set down to lynching—Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Utah. It is a general question, it is not a question of color, or of North or South.

Mr. HERSEY. Is not the State of Ohio to-day, a law-abiding State, doing all it can to protect itself?

Mr. BURTON. It is observing the law pro tanto, and pro tanto probably means this last year in everything, but when a lynching occurs there is no due process of law, there is no due enforcement of law.

Mr. HERSEY. When there is a lynching in Ohio the State has denied the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. BURTON. The victim has certainly been denied the equal protection of the law, and he is entitled by the Constitution of the United States to a trial by a jury. He ought not to be hurried away and put to death.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. BURTON. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill should not be regarded as raising a sectional question. You gentlemen of the South as well as the rest of us condemn this terrible reproach upon our civilization. We are entering a new era now in these wonderful years succeeding the war. We should enter that era with new ideals as to equality, as to liberty, as to the sacredness of human life. It is not enough that we are great in material civilization. We have no fear from the pestilence that walketh in darkness or the destruction that wasteth at noonday, but we have for the more insidious attacks upon the very framework of our institutions from those outbursts of violence which disgrace the land, from the brutality, the murder, the disregard of law and order; and for one as I stand here I am not ready to assume the responsibility of failing to take every possible step to bring to an end this condition and substitute for it universal protection by the broad shield of the United States over every citizen in the Republic, however weak, however humble, whatever his race, whatever his color. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, it is with great diffidence and some degree of hesitation that in following the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] I take issue with him regarding the constitutionality of the pending bill. His exceptional mental attainments, his intellectual integrity and high character make him a most potent influence in the House, and dispose the membership to a sympathetic reception of any position he maintains. He speaks convincingly of changed and changing conditions, and ventures to hope that the long line of Supreme Court decisions construing the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, each of which, without exception, denounces the principle underlying the proposed legislation, will at some subsequent time be either modified or repudiated, and, indulging such hope, he advocates the passage of the bill.

I think all of us are aware of the change taking place in our national life, but I do not believe that the change is sufficiently compelling to induce the Supreme Court of its own motion to amend the Constitution of the United States, nor do I believe that changing conditions should be so persuasive as to induce the membership of the House, sworn as we are to uphold and defend the Constitution, to ruthlessly ravish it. [Applause.]

It should be unnecessary for me to give utterance to my abhorrence of the crime of lynching. I yield to no man in my desire to efface this institution from our national life. I will go as far as any man to enact legislation of a most drastic character to punish those guilty of this offense. I will not, however, consciously be a party to the passage of legislation so obnoxious to the Constitution as to be a mere gesture, so utterly and indefensively void as to bear only the appearance of service in accomplishing the end it assumes to seek.

I am not unmindful of how cruelly mobs have invaded personal rights; I am not so unsympathetic that I can stand indifferent in the presence of the hanging and burning of my fellow men. I realize fully the national disgrace and humiliation which follows upon such incidents. But the injury inflicted by mob violence is incomparably greater than that comprehended in personal suffering or national degradation. Out of the years have come rules of conduct which the wisdom and experience of the ages have disclosed as necessary to the governing of organized society. To permit mobs to abolish these laws and precepts of conduct and to substitute in their stead the will of the frenzied, the "many-headed," is to destroy the fabric of civilization itself and to submit the future to anarchy.

In my opposition to this bill I do not seek to defeat antilynching legislation. If I opposed such legislation, I would support this measure, for the reason that under the Constitution it will prove utterly innocuous. I seek to amend it so as to make it possible to enact a law in harmony with constitutional requirements and which the courts may enforce when offenders are brought to the bar of justice.

I do not care to discuss the constitutional question involved from the standpoint of precedent. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court bearing upon that question have been cited many times during the course of this debate, and it will serve no purpose to reiterate them. I prefer to debate it upon principle, and during what I may have to say I invite questions from the Members who are good enough to listen to me.

The Government of the United States is unique among the nations of the earth. It has no counterpart, and because in its entirety it does not seem adjusted to the needs of any other people, I doubt whether it will ever have a counterpart. It began with States, each a complete sovereign in itself and possessing every power requisite to its government as a separate entity. The need for solidarity for identical aims and practices early became apparent. The War of the Revolution disclosed that a common enemy cemented the political subdivisions, and such disclosure was a potent argument for a more "perfect union." Out of such necessity came the General or Federal Government.

We often speak of it—with great pride, of course—as a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," and it was so characterized long before immortal Lincoln used the phrase. It, however, was never a government by the people, nor was it intended by the fathers to be such a government. Those who fashioned it, influenced, no doubt, by the predictions of disaster, realizing that it was largely an experiment, and being somewhat doubtful as to whether mankind had reached that far frontier on the road to a higher civilization which would justify surrendering to him complete governmental control, wrote into the Constitution many checks that safeguarded the Government from the people.

Prior to the somewhat recent ratification of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, which permits the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people, the electors of America could vote directly for but one official, and that one a Member of this body. The President was chosen by electors selected by the people; the judiciary, from the Chief Justice to the lowest commissioner, was appointed; the Diplomatic and Consular Service, which carries our activities to the far reaches of the earth, were in no wise dependent upon the people's choice; the members of the Cabinet and the hundreds of thousands who work under them were appointed by officers whom the people did not select. In fact, every official but one—and his term of office the shortest—was entirely removed from the direct control of the electorate. An amendment to the Constitution but recently introduced by Senator NORRIS, of my State—and which meets my entire approval—will, if passed and ratified, bring the Government still closer to the people, and is but one of many manifestations of the changes which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] probably had in mind.

The Constitution, so safeguarding the Government from direct control of the people, was inspired by the desire for the perpetuity of the Government, and to understand it and the necessity for it we would have to place ourselves as its framers were placed when it was written. The really remarkable thing, however, judged by the times and conditions, the thing which makes this instrument the greatest document given to man since the Sermon on the Mount, was the manner in which the rights of the people were safeguarded from their Government.

The Constitution is a grant of power, and every power granted came from the people. The government created was not an autocratic government which assumed the power to control the people, but a government which assumed no power which the people voluntarily did not grant. This is written in the instrument when it reserves to the people and the States every power not expressly granted. Consequently the construction always placed upon it by the highest court in the land has been to deny to Congress power to act unless by the Constitution that power has been granted by the people.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield to a question from me?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. LAYTON. I do not profess to know anything about constitutional law, but from what I have gathered during this debate there is no decision from the Supreme Court favorable to the constitutionality of this bill. Is that right?

Mr. REAVIS. I have found none and not one has been cited in this debate.

Mr. LAYTON. That is the point I am trying to get at. If that is the case, how can I stand before the Speaker of the House and take a solemn oath to support the Constitution, when the supreme authority, the Supreme Court, has always construed the fourteenth amendment against this bill?

Mr. REAVIS. That question, Doctor, you must determine under the dictates of your own conscience. I have always felt and feel now that the presence of this bill on the floor places most of us between the two horns of a dilemma. We must either do violence to our conscience and vote for it or lose many Negro votes at home by voting against it. [Applause.]

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Gladly.

Mr. CLOUSE. Of course, on the question of lynching, no Member of the House, I presume, would offer any defense to it. As to the constitutional question, no man can justify the enactment of this bill as reported. I have listened to all the debate on the bill, and I want the gentleman's construction on the first section, which, when stripped of unnecessary verbiage, would read like this: "The phrase 'mob or riotous assemblage' means an assemblage acting in concert to take life as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some public offense."

Will the gentleman indulge me while I assume a hypothetical case? Suppose, while we are deliberating here, a red-handed anarchist on the outside of the Nation's Capitol should appear and five members of the Metropolitan police force should see him in the act of throwing a bomb and demolishing this building, endangering the life of every man in the structure. They might not have time to seize him under the requirements of this bill before he perpetrated the act; would they be permitted to kill him to prevent the commission of his intended crime?

Mr. REAVIS. You mean under the provisions of this proposed legislation?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes; under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; notwithstanding this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. CLOUSE. Would they under the first section have the authority to take life that they might preserve life?

Mr. REAVIS. My objection did not apply to the first section, but the gentleman has disclosed to me an objection that I did not entertain before.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague from Nebraska yield to me that I may ask a question of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. REAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. KINKAID. The gentleman from Nebraska expressed his opinion in answer to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee that his answer must be in the affirmative. Would not the common law authorize the taking of the life of the anarchist if he were in the act of committing the crime stated?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes; under the common and statutory law, but not under this bill unless they were to subject themselves to its penalties.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Nebraska are both correct, but for the moment I would prefer not to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] has the floor.

Mr. REAVIS. May I recur now to the thought I expressed regarding the powers of Congress under the Constitution and making application of these powers to the pending legislation. We are not left in doubt as to the constitutional authority claimed by the proponents of the bill. Not only has it been proclaimed in this debate but it is recited in the proposed legislation that the fourteenth amendment is the fountainhead, and appeal is made to that portion of the fourteenth amendment which prohibits a State from denying equal protection of the laws to its citizens. It may be advisable to read again the constitutional provision involved. It is as follows:

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

This provision, being the grant of power to Congress, limits the exercise of that power.

The people in ratifying the Constitution gave to Congress certain general powers, such as exclusive control of interstate commerce. On everything pertaining to that subject matter Congress has absolute and exclusive control. But the powers delegated by the fourteenth amendment are prohibitory in character. That is to say, if the State denies equal protection of the laws, Congress may act, but some action of the State, either of commission or omission, must precede any action on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman in principle, but let me ask the gentleman a question. Suppose the officers of the State fail to act. Do they come within the same argument?

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman anticipates me. I will come to that presently.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. In just a minute.

The only legislation Congress can enact under the fourteenth amendment is not general legislation such as is authorized by the interstate-commerce section, but is corrective legislation. Now, what are we empowered to correct? Are we empowered to correct the act of some individual or collection or mob of individuals? No such power is granted by the Constitution. We can only legislate to correct some act of the State which denies equal protection of the law to its citizenship. But the act of the State must be a condition precedent to congressional legislation.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman think that the act of the sheriff is not the act of the State?

Mr. REAVIS. I am not speaking of the act of the sheriff nor any other governmental department of the State. I hope to reach that later.

May I now call to your attention the fourth section of this bill, which reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That any person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage by which a person is put to death shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned for life or for not less than five years.

This section is complete in itself. The offense is defined, the offender is described, and the punishment provided; but nowhere, directly or indirectly, does it refer to any action of the State in denying equal protection of the law, without which there is no violation of the Constitution which would empower the Federal Government to act.

I now ask the distinguished chairman of the committee and the author of the bill upon what action of the State in violation of the Constitution do you predicate section 4?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I expect to discuss the matter later on.

Mr. REAVIS. To show the practical operation of section 4, let me state a hypothetical case. I notice the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] before me. Suppose that five men acting in concert should kill him, though I confess such an event would be a great national calamity. Any one or all of the five would be amenable to the provisions of section 4. The State had nothing to do with the commission of the crime. The State instead of denying equal protection of the law would immediately proclaim his right to equal protection by prosecuting his murderers.

I again would like to inquire what infraction of the Constitution is relied upon to justify the Federal Government in assuming jurisdiction of this crime?

It is not necessary, however, to depend upon assumed conditions to reveal the indefensible character of the provisions of this bill. Let me recite a real occurrence that seems much in point.

Not long since there was a lynching in Omaha. A Negro was incarcerated in the Douglas County jail, which is a part of the magnificent Douglas County courthouse. A mob formed in the evening, and the fact being called to the attention of the mayor, Mr. Ed Smith, he repaired to the courthouse, where were assembled practically the entire police force. I am acquainted with Mr. Smith. He is the type of man who is not afraid of much that goes on in this world of ours. As I recall it, they took the Negro from a cell on the lower floor to the upper story of the building and kept him there in the darkness to shield him from the mob, which was constantly augmented, and growing more desperate and unruly. Failing to find the culprit in the jail, and being satisfied that he was somewhere in the building, the crowd in its frenzy set fire to the courthouse. Up in the darkness the law officers of the city kept the accused as long as safety would permit. Finally, being driven out by the smoke and the flames, they groped their way through the corridors and down the stairways, constantly pleading with the crowd to permit the law to have its way and not to disgrace the city and the State by perpetrating the horrid crime of lynching. So far did they defend the Negro that the mob, apparently gone crazy, took the mayor to the nearest lamppost and hung him. Fortunately, that contemplated crime was too atrocious, and the mayor was cut down before he was permanently injured, though he was incapacitated for weeks from injury and shock.

Under section 4 of this measure every member of the mob would be liable to punishment in the Federal jurisdiction. Was the fourteenth amendment violated by the State of Nebraska, without which the Government of the United States would be powerless? The law officers charged with his custody and protection defended him to the gallows; step by step they accompanied him down into the very valley of the shadow itself to give him the equal protection of the law. Will some proponent of this bill suggest the constitutional ground upon which the Federal Government would assume to try and punish those who committed the crime?

The whole theory of the bill is wrong in that it is predicated on the acts of individuals while the constitutional prohibition runs against the State.

I desire to discuss other sections of the bill, which, as I view them, are as indefensible as section 4, and I hope to answer the question of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], who made a brilliant constitutional argument for the bill and cited many decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, every one of which, when understood, destroyed the very principle for which he contended. [Laughter.]

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman be kind enough to read them? Evidently he has not.

Mr. REAVIS. I will be glad to read one of his citations now, the case of James against Bowman, reported in the one hundred and ninetieth United States reports.

Mr. LITTLE. There is not a single, solitary line in that case that is in contradiction of what I stated.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not yield for further interruption now. The gentleman asked for the reading of the opinion. Will he please listen? I select this case from among the many cited by the gentleman to prove the constitutionality of this bill, not alone because it is the leading case construing the fourteenth amendment but because it was written by a very distinguished judge from the gentleman's own State.

Will you listen to what Judge Brewer says with reference to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government under the fourteenth amendment:

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it and which we have just considered, add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty. (James v. Bowman, 192 U. S., 136.)

To the same effect is United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542). This is the opinion cited by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] in support of section 4, which section is predicated exclusively on individual action and utterly ignores any action on the part of the State. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it possible that the gentleman does not know that I exactly so stated the application of that decision, and that a moment ago I just asked the gentleman whether he meant to say that when the sheriff refused protection to a man, the State did not act. I ask the gentleman again: Does the gentleman mean to say that when the sheriff refuses a man protection, the State has not acted?

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman cited this decision and many others equally opposed to the principle of this bill in support of its constitutionality. So far as the act of the sheriff is concerned, I would go further than the gentleman's question suggests.

Mr. LITTLE. Go as far as you like.

Mr. REAVIS. I would take a more advanced ground than you suggest, but not to be led away for the moment, I want the gentleman to say whether he believes the fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of this bill are predicated upon a violation of the Constitution by the State, without which Congress is not empowered to act?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Would the gentleman like more time?

Mr. REAVIS. I would like 10 additional minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to have the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] give me a yes or no answer to the question as to whether the fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of this bill are based upon the actions of individuals or the action of the State.

Mr. LITTLE. That is not what I said.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not care what the gentleman said. I seek an answer which I hope will be different from what you said.

Mr. LITTLE. In the first place I will decide whether I will answer the question yes or no. That will be for me to say. The gentleman has asked me a question. In the speech which I delivered on this subject I said that in my judgment it would be better to hook the second section onto the fourth section in order to be sure that it would be constitutional, and that I would offer an amendment of that kind.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman has asked me a question and I want to answer it.

Mr. REAVIS. Go on, but do not take all of my 10 minutes in answering it.

Mr. LITTLE. I further said that in my judgment the Supreme Court would probably interpret all the law together and hold that the fourth section did apply to the second, and I think there is no doubt about it. I challenge the gentleman to name any decision ever made to the contrary.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the gentleman's opinion on this proposition: Suppose the sheriff of a county deliberately refuses to make any effort to protect a man from the mob. Is the State responsible for that so that we can punish that official of the State?

Mr. REAVIS. I do not question it, because the act of a State official is the act of the State. The State is merely a governing agency that acts through individuals, and in so acting they are the State. I hope to develop the idea more fully either on the floor or in an extension of remarks.

Mr. MANN. If that is the case, can not we enact a law under the fourteenth amendment punishing that official?

Mr. REAVIS. I think we can do more than that. If a State official fails or refuses to make every reasonable effort to protect a man to the end that he may be given equal protection of the laws, and a mob acting in conspiracy with the State through its official, deprives him of the equal protection of the laws, I think we can punish not only the State official but all of the mob who are his coconspirators. I would like, however, to develop that more logically as I proceed with this bill.

Mr. MANN. Is not the bill predicated on the same proposition, upon the act of the official of the State who does not give reasonable protection to the prisoner sought by the mob?

Mr. REAVIS. On the contrary, the bill is predicated on the acts of individuals. My complaint is that the action of the State is ignored, which act is the only condition that would authorize Congress to act.

Time will not permit me to discuss the several sections of the bill to which I object as fully as I would like, and I will therefore briefly invite your attention to sections 5 and 6. These two sections would be very effective in preventing lynchings if it were in our power to enact them, but as I view them they are utterly without any authority granted by the Constitution.

Section 5 provides:

That any county in which a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall forfeit $10,000.

Provision is made for the recovery of the money by an action instituted in the name of the United States, and the disposition of the money, when recovered, to the family of the deceased, or to the United States in case he has no family.

The enforcement of this penalty against a subdivision of the State is not dependent upon any act of the State in violation of a constitutional duty. The only act necessary for the Federal Government to recover $10,000 from a county is the act of a few individuals who violate the laws of the State. If Congress can enact section 5 and subject a county to this penalty because a few individuals, not necessarily residents of the county or State, commit murder within its borders, then Congress can inflict a penalty upon a county if within its confines some individuals commit burglary or assault and battery. Congress can not act unless the power to act is granted by the Constitution, and after somewhat diligent investigation I have failed to find any power granted by that instrument which would authorize congressional action solely because murder is committed within a State.

There is another insuperable objection to section 5. Where is there constitutional warrant for the Federal Government to inflict such penalty upon a State or a subdivision of the State? Every authority cited in support of the section relates to a penalty inflicted by a State upon one of its own subdivisions. The authority to do this is so obvious that no one will question it, but it seems to me that the distinction between the State providing a penalty against one of its subdivisions and the United States attempting to inflict a penalty upon a separate sovereignty is equally obvious. I know of no constitutional warrant, nor do I know of any precedent for such an act. As I view it, the Federal Government is as powerless to assess forfeitures against a State as one State is powerless to assess forfeitures against another State. We can not tax a State or a county; we can not even control their method of taxation. If we could there would be far fewer tax-exempt securities floated by States, counties, school districts, and similar subdivisions than at present. The procedure proposed by section 5 is nothing less than judicial taxation, though it is a great deal more.

Section 6 of the bill is even worse than section 5. It is not only unconstitutional, it is unmoral. It is fanaticism gone mad. It provides:

That in the event that any person so put to death shall have been transported by such mob or riotous assemblage from one county to another county during the time intervening between his capture and putting to death every county in or through which he was so transported shall be jointly and severally liable to pay the forfeiture herein provided.

I think this section is sui generis. I am glad to believe that it is the only specimen of its kind in all time. I have listened patiently for some one to defend it, or at least inform us whence it came and why. The offense committed by the county is evidently the failure to build barb-wire defenses about its domain, because the only thing necessary to subject its citizens to a fine of $10,000 is that a mob should go "in or through" the county. It might be done in the nighttime, with no one in the county being aware of the fact. This, however, would be no defense, if the mob once got in the county. It is not necessary to the crime that the State or county deny one the equal protection of the law; it is not necessary to the offense that even a private citizen of the State should be a party to or know of the existence of a mob; it is only necessary for a mob to enter a county—not to commit any offense there—and the Federal Government is in some way, by some grant of power from some unknown source, authorized to penalize a separate and distinct sovereignty in the sum of $10,000.

The south line of my home county is the border between the States of Nebraska and Kansas. Under the provisions of section 6 a mob might form in Kansas at night and, in search of a convenient tree, go through a corner of my county. It is of no concern that no crime was committed in my county; without regard to the fact that not a person within the State of Nebraska knew of the existence of the mob or its contemplated crime, nevertheless we would come within the purview of this section and our property be subjected to a $10,000 forfeiture. This section is so utterly indefensible upon both constitutional and moral grounds that I deem it useless to debate it further.

I shall be very glad to support this bill if it can be amended, as I think it can, so as not to exceed our constitutional powers. I regret, of course, that my opposition to certain of its provisions has been accepted by some as indicative that I oppose all Federal legislation on the subject and by others that I am in favor of mob violence and lynching. If I were to follow the advice of many letters and telegrams recently received by me, I would vote for the bill as it is, even though I know it can serve no good purpose, because it can not be enforced.

I prefer, however, to contribute to its correction in order that some legislation may be had to punish the most atrocious and menacing offense known to our national life.

I believe that sections 5 and 6 should be stricken from the bill and the principle of the remaining sections so changed that Federal intervention shall depend entirely upon some act of the State which denies equal protection of the law, rather than upon the act of a mob of individuals.

A State is a sort of artificial entity, whose sole purpose is that of a governing agency. It acts, of course, through individuals. There are but three ways that a State makes its power manifest; that is, through its legislative, its judicial, or its executive departments. It can act in no other way. If a State deny equal protection of the law through some act of its legislative department no action is necessary on the part of Congress, for the reason that the law passed by the State legislature is void and falls of its own weight. But if such denial results from acts committed by its judicial or executive departments, then, under the fourteenth amendment, Congress not only has the power to act but owes the duty to act.

Suggestion has been made during the debate that the Federal Government by laying violent hands on the governor or other State official would violate the sovereignty of the State. It is a sufficient answer to say that neither the governor nor any other State official has the sovereign right to violate the Constitution of the United States. A governor out in Illinois, I believe, considered himself above the laws of his State, and his experience should have a salutary effect on any State official who holds himself above the Constitution of his country. More than that, however, is the power delegated by the fourteenth amendment. The States, when they ratified the Constitution, did more than grant general powers to the Federal Government; they granted, in some instances, the further power to prevent the States from doing certain things. When the States ratified the fourteenth amendment, thereby granting the power to the General Government to prohibit a State from denying equal protection of the law to its citizens and coupled with it the authority to Congress to legislate to enforce such prohibition, the States surrendered all sovereignty in the premises, and having surrendered it there remained no sovereignty to violate.

I have no doubt that Congress has the power to fix penalties against any State officer, charged with the custody and protection of an accused when he denies him the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman stated that where an officer of the State fails to give proper protection it is the act of the State. Take my State of South Carolina; it has both constitutional and statutory prohibition which makes a man forfeit his office and renders him incapable of ever holding office again and subject to be sent to the penitentiary. Now, if he does that, is that not in absolute violation of the laws of the State?

Mr. REAVIS. Certainly it is. But I have not made myself clear. The State's action is made manifest by the action of individuals. The State is an intangible, artificial entity, created for the sole purpose of acting as a governing agency. When the sheriff is in custody of a prisoner he is not acting for the State, he is the State acting, and the State can not act in any other way. Now, to say that because the State acting through its sheriff, whether in violation of the State law or in some other way, can render the Government powerless to enforce the Constitution is to argue the utter destruction of constitutional government. To say that it lies in the power of the State, either directly or indirectly, to prevent enforcement of constitutional provisions, is to render the entire instrument abortive and to ultimately destroy the finest result of man's age-long struggle, the constitutional government of America.

Much information has been given us regarding the frequency with which the crime of lynching has been committed and the number of persons lynched, but nothing has been related regarding convictions of lynchers. If the States are enforcing the laws, then there is no need nor is there authority for Federal legislation. I believe the best way to prevent lynching is in an orderly and legal way to hang a few lynchers.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. UPSHAW. I would like to emphasize the fact that I have never known in my section of the State a lynching that was not followed by an offer of reward for the capture of the lynchers. I emphasize the fact that it shows that there is nothing culpable in the attitude of the State; that the State is loyal to the Constitution and good government.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I am interested in the statement made by the gentleman about the mayor of Omaha, and I am wondering if the record shows that the participants in the mob were punished.

Mr. REAVIS. I am glad to answer the gentleman, and I do so with some degree of justifiable pride. A grand jury was called in that county, of which Mr. John W. Towle, my cousin, was foreman; with courage that was admirable, setting an example that might well be emulated by other sections of the country, he went to the bottom of that matter and brought the offenders to the bar of justice.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. In case the bill was enacted into law and the State not liable, where the person who had been lynched was not in the custody of State officials, would not that question be raised on demurrer in the proceedings, and would it not free the State of its liability? Whereas if the party lynched was in the custody of State officials, under these decisions, in that event the reward could be collected and the punishment inflicted.

Mr. REAVIS. As stated by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], in one of the ablest constitutional arguments I have ever heard, in or out of Congress, under this proposed legislation no charge could be based except when the accused was in the custody of an officer, and the bill would not be serviceable in race riots such as occurred in East St. Louis.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. I am of the same opinion.

Mr. REAVIS. To recur to what I had in mind before the interruptions, I would like to state that such information as I have clearly indicates a laxity of law enforcement against mobs. It is easy to understand why this should result. The accused Negro, in the first instance, is probably none too popular, the conventional crime which results in lynching is one so atrocious and revolting as to shock the entire community, and frequently the social and political prestige of some of the members of the mob is of such character that no earnest effort is made to apprehend them. There are many who believe that such summary punishment is essential to put fear in the hearts of others who might be tempted to commit a similar offense. I believe that federal legislation within the Constitution would have a salutary effect, and I am convinced that we should do all that we are empowered to do to destroy this disgraceful practice.

With such a view, I am of the opinion that whenever a State officer fails or refuses to give an accused every reasonable protection the State whose officer he is has violated the fourteenth amendment and that Congress is thereupon empowered to act against such officer.

I believe, further, that whenever a mob acts in conspiracy with such officer to deprive the accused of equal protection of the laws the individual members may be reached as conspirators.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I suggest to the gentleman that if the individual has any protection under the fourteenth amendment, it is in section 5008, against conspiracy.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to say that section 5008 only gives protection when the individual is intimidated in pursuance of some act exercising some right guaranteed him expressly by the Constitution of the United States or in the laws of the United States.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. You can not protect him in a right not guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. REAVIS. I do not know what amendments are contemplated by the chairman of the committee, but I do know that I shall offer certain amendments which I believe are essential to the constitutionality of the legislation. I would be very glad, indeed, if I could support the bill as reported, but for reasons somewhat hurriedly and imperfectly stated I find myself unable to do so. My congressional service will close with my present term, and while not in the best taste to suggest it, I am impelled to say that I have never consciously cast a vote in this body that was inspired either by political expediency or selfish interest. I think on this bill and on others that may present themselves for consideration during the remainder of my service I shall follow the same course. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, the press, the pulpit, and the public are united in opposition to mob violence and lynch law.

There is not a man in this House who does not condemn its practice and who will not cooperate in any intelligent effort to provide State punishment for those persons who engage in such acts of outlawry.

The bill under consideration will not accomplish the purpose sought, but may, upon the contrary, cause, through propaganda of the ignorant, the renewal of a brutal and unnatural crime which first occasioned this lawless method of mob punishment.

The mob is a survival of a primitive instinct which is brought into existence by the act or acts of some person whose conduct for the moment produces upon certain sections of a local community an excitement which deprives it of reason, producing a temporary insanity, followed by acts of brutality which in saner moments are deplored.

A scientist states:

The resulting characteristics of the crowd are (a) a descent of several rungs in the ladder of civilization; (b) a general intellectual inferiority, as compared with the isolated individual; (c) loss of moral responsibility; (d) impulsiveness; (e) credulity; (f) exaggeration; (g) intolerance; (h) blind obedience to the leader of the crowd.

Whenever a community reaches this hysterical stage it is injured just as an individual would suffer in nerves, physical exhaustion and depression following a nervous reaction.

The local community must apply the remedy. One recourse will naturally be the removal of the cause. The remedy is, however, local not national.

Mr. Holland Thompson, in a volume of the Yale University Press, gives a dispassionate statement upon this subject:

* * * * * * *

Rape is by no means the only crime thus punished; sometimes the charge is so trivial that one recoils in horror at the thought of taking human life as punishment.

* * * * * * *

Yet it must not be forgotten that over certain parts of the South a nameless dread is always hovering. In some sections an unaccompanied white woman dislikes to walk through an unlighted village street at night; she hesitates to drive along a lonely country road in broad daylight without a pistol near at hand; and she does not dare to walk through the woods alone. The rural districts are poorly policed, and the ears of the farmer working in the field are always alert for the sound of the bell or the horn calling for help, perhaps from his own home. Occasionally, in spite of all precautions, some human animal, inflamed by brooding upon the unattainable, leaves a victim outraged and dead, or worse than dead. Granted that such a crime occurs in a district only once in 10, or even 20 years; that is enough. Rural folks have long memories, and in the back of their minds persists an uncontrollable morbid dread. The news of another victim sometimes turns men into fiends who do not only take life but even inflict torture beforehand. The mere suspicion of intent is sometimes enough to deprive such a community of its reason, for there are communities which have brooded over the possibility of the commission of the inexpiable crime until the residents are not quite sane upon this matter. Naturally calmness and forbearance in dealing with other and less heinous forms of Negro crime are not always found in such a neighborhood. This fact helps to explain, though not to excuse, some of the riots that occur.

Continuing, he describes the futility of mob action in arresting crime and the changed attitude of that section of our country where this crime is most prevalent.

The better element in the South, however, opposes mob violence, and this opposition is growing stronger and more purposeful. Associations have been formed to oppose mob rule and to punish participants. Where reputable citizens are lukewarm it is largely because they have not realized that the old tradition that lynching is the proper remedy for rape can not stand. If sudden, sharp retribution were inflicted upon absolute proof, only for this one cause, it is doubtful whether such effective opposition could be enlisted. Yet wiser men have seen defiance of law fail to stop crime, have seen mobs act upon suspicions afterwards proved groundless, have seen mob action widely extended, and have seen the growth of a spirit of lawlessness. Where one mob has had its way, another is always more easily aroused, and soon the administration of the law becomes a farce.

The southern situation, where the white and black races are more nearly divided, presents a different and more difficult problem than in northern sections, but as the Negro continues his migration to the North we find in recent years constantly recurring incidents of this summary and lawless infliction of punishment.

The old practice of lynching in a frontier community, where established law did not prevail and where there was no orderly administration of justice, must be separated in our minds from mob violence perpetrated in organized communities, where the machinery of justice is available.

Mob law is not now sectional, and it has extended to other crimes than assaults upon white women.

Available statistics are not satisfactory nor conclusive, but from those procurable we find, in 1889, there was a total of 66 lynchings, of which 19 were for assaults upon white women.

And for 1904, the last date in this particular table, there was a total of 61, of which 18 were for assaults upon women.

In the State of Missouri, between 1885 and 1920, there was a total of 85 lynchings; in 1889 there were 6 lynchings; in 1920 there was 1; and during the 10 years preceding 1920 a total of 10.

While this total of 85 in 35 years is deplorable, it shows that the record of Missouri compares favorably with the extent of this crime in other States, and that there is a decrease rather than an increase of this offense.

During the year 1921, for some reason, crimes of all kinds increased, especially those of violence—let the psychologist ascribe the cause—and with this startling increase of criminal acts of violence we find that in the first half of 1921—the only figures available—there was a corresponding increase in lynchings which numbered 36, of which number 11 were for rape.

In 1919—according to statistics placed in the RECORD by the author of this bill—there was a total of 83 lynchings, of which 27 were for crimes against white women.

In 1920 there was a total of 65 lynchings, of which 21 were for crimes against white women.

When we turn back to the first available figures in 1889 and find a total of 66 lynchings, of which 19 were for assaults upon white women, and compare this with a total of 65 lynchings in 1920, of which 21 were for assaults upon white women, the comparison startles, because in 30 years we find a decrease of one lynching but an increase of two for assaults upon white women.

All the figures here used are taken from the Negro Yearbook.

In 1889 there was a total of 127 lynchings, of which 38 were for crimes against white women.

In 1920 there was a total of 61 lynchings, of which 18 were for crimes against white women.

In the 35-year period there was a total of 3,092 lynchings, and a total of 882 were lynched for crimes against white women.

These figures are horrible beyond description.

Three thousand and ninety-two human beings executed in a lawless manner.

Eight hundred and eighty-two white women assaulted by black brutes.

We find that over 35 per cent of the causes for lynchings were for assaults on white women.

How many innocent people, how many men have lost their lives, and how many brave officers have been killed in defending law and order against the mob is not known, but may double the number of those lynched.

White men defending the law and trying to save the Negro charged with assault upon their own women have shot and killed members of the mob, and the mob, in order to attain its object of protecting their white women from these assaults have not hesitated to kill white citizens and white officers who stood in their defense.

A comparison of each year from 1889 to 1920 does not disclose an increase in lynchings, nor does it show a decrease in the crimes of blacks against white women.

The record remains about stationary, which causes some suspicion of this measure which is now, for the first time, pushed upon the United States Government for solution.

It is unfortunate, especially for the self-respecting Negro man, that this issue has been pressed. The unnatural crime of rape, committed by a few members of his race, is the source of mortification and shame to him, and yet its discussion can not be avoided when his propaganda and white political necessity push it forward for national consideration.

The proponents of this bill must accept the responsibility for interjecting this discussion. They have forced the issue and must accept the blame for all damage that occurs.

I unite with them in sincere condemnation of lynch law and mob violence.

Mob law breeds contempt for all law and lowers the standard of citizenship not only of the community but the respect within which the State is held wherein it is permitted to take place.

The spirit of mob law knows no race nor color, no sex nor religion, and has little respect for general authority, either human or divine.

The mighty influence of the church everywhere is found on the side of law and order, and the minister of the gospel is doing more than any political bill introduced in Congress can do to stop these barbarous practices.

Cleveland, Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson, and President Harding have all given consideration to and an express disapproval of mob violence; but none has, either directly or indirectly, suggested that the solution was through national interference.

They have been ably supported by educators and learned men and women who spend time and money in the discussion of this subject, but none of these advocates the same solution as that proposed by the gentleman from Missouri.

This bill will not help in the solution. It will retard it. It will not lessen race rancor and discord but will increase it.

The lynching problem is local and State, not National. The community which is educated to punish mob violence and to condemn it will prevent its occurrence, but this can not be done by national law.

We have laws against murder and various other crimes too numerous to mention, and yet the law is constantly violated; but for that reason we do not rush to Washington and ask for national aid in the enforcement of these laws.

States have severe laws punishing murder by the mob; governors are given power to remove officials who are lax in the enforcement of the law; provision is made for the punishment of official laxness; and the attitude of not only the southern press but the press of the whole United States is united in condemnation of mob violence.

This bill is political in character, unconstitutional, pressed at an inopportune time, and, while ostensibly for the benefit of the Negro, will in its effect be most harmful to him.

Coming as it does only as a political expedient, it prevents the carrying out of the statesmanlike suggestions of both Mr. Wilson and President Harding.

The thoughtful minds of our leading men and women desire that this complex question should be settled without heat, partisanship, appeals to passion, or sectional prejudice.

OUR NEGRO CITIZENS.

The introduction of this bill is most unfortunate for our Negro citizens. It will precipitate an acrimonious discussion in every voting precinct in the Nation.

I consider myself to be a real friend of the Negro. I have been his friend in private life and in public performance.

I am opposed to the Ku Klux Klan and kindred organizations. But equally despicable with these organizations, which raise the race question against the Negro, are those organizations which prey upon the Negro not for his benefit, not for his advancement, not for his progress, but for the sole and exclusive purpose of securing his vote. As between the two my contempt is divided.

The Negro citizen must be given equal opportunity for education, advancement, and knowledge. In my State this is done in separate schools, and is working out advantageously, and wherever there is a demand for the quality or number of the Negro schools to be increased what influence I have will be in favor of the project.

The Negro citizen requires the white citizen's help and should receive it.

When we consider that some 50 years ago their ancestors were slaves and that, going back 150 years, some of them were living in the jungles of Africa, with practically no civilization, no laws, no history; in an environment conducive to indolence; with a primitive religion which believed in spirits and was controlled by the voodoo man; with hardly any laws of family; where polygamy was practiced and in some sections cannibalism indulged in; and then viewing them as they are to-day, law-abiding citizens of a great Republic, numbering many able lawyers, financiers, newspaper men, writers, poets, inventors, philanthropists, and churchmen of a high order, we stop in amazement and are astonished at the progress of their race.

And now, within 50 years, they have advanced to a position of civilization exceeding that of the peoples of many older nations. Their history is one of tragedy which demands our sympathy. But when we view with condemnation the acts of brutality which tore them away from their African homes and carried them across the seas to be the servants of the white man, it can not be denied that, looking upon their present progress and contrasting it with the life of their immediate ancestors, and showing what wonderful changes environment and association has done in overcoming heredity, the curses of slavery may, for them, after all, have been a blessing.

Nevertheless, the great problem has not been solved.

One portion has been ascertained in recent years, and that is that we will not have a mixed race to take the place of the white and black.

Once this matter is understood and accepted by our Negro citizens, much of the difficulty of the race problem will disappear.

For the black man to put his hand upon a white woman with evil intent means death, either by the ordinary processes of law or by creating an excitement resembling insanity, which produces a mob and a violent death.

If some of the Negro organizations, and some of the white lawyers employed by them, would devote their propaganda, some of their money, some of their time, inculcating into the few members of their race who attempt to reach over the color line either by marriage or by the bestial crime of rape, the knowledge that this can not be done without extreme penalty, then much of the lynch spirit would stop without the aid of the law or the protests of enlightened citizenship.

THE DYER BILL.

This bill proposes to extend Federal sovereignty over every constable, marshal, sheriff, police officer, prosecuting attorney, circuit attorney, attorney general, adjutant general, and governor of each State in the Union.

It provides for fines and imprisonment for individual citizens of each State.

It provides for a fine of $10,000, which may be charged to a county and is to be paid into the United States Treasury.

It provides for a Federal tax levy, under certain circumstances, upon the citizens of a county.

It provides for a Federal fine upon the citizens of a county through which certain described persons merely pass.

It proposes to try citizens of a State before a Federal judge and jury for offenses which are against State laws.

It proposes to supervise State, county, and municipal agents elected by the citizens of the city, county, and State.

It proposes to direct or punish the conduct of local, county, and State officials for whose maintenance and support the United States does not pay one dollar.

It proposes, in effect, to place under a bond each and every law-enforcement officer in 48 separate States.

In the State of Missouri there are approximately 456 constables and deputy constables;

Approximately 342 marshals and deputy marshals;

Approximately 684 sheriffs and deputy sheriffs;

Approximately 342 prosecuting attorneys, circuit attorneys, and assistants;

Approximately 3,000 municipal police officers; and

An attorney general, adjutant general of militia, and governor.

In round numbers a total of approximately 5,000 peace officers and prosecutors in the State of Missouri, who are not appointed or paid by the United States Government, are made subject to fine and imprisonment by agents of the United States.

This small army of elected and appointed officials of my State are, first, to be investigated by Federal agents; second, prosecuted by Federal agents; third, tried before Federal judges; and fourth, to face confinement in a Federal prison if certain provisions of this law are not complied with.

And these provisions are for three conditions: First, failure to act; second, neglecting to act; and third, refusal to act; giving the careful Federal agent three shots at a single object, so that if he misses with the first he may try a second and then the third.

There are approximately 5,000 municipal, county, and State officials who will be placed in jeopardy in Missouri, with a population of 3,500,000.

This gives Missouri 1 peace officer for each 700 inhabitants.

On the same basis, with 105,000,000 people in the United States, this means that 150,000 peace officers will pass under the control and direction of this law.

New York City has a police department of over 10,000 men; Chicago, over 5,000; Philadelphia, 4,500; Detroit, over 1,500; St. Louis and Cleveland, each, nearly 1,200; and Boston, over 1,500. The chiefs of police, captains, lieutenants, sergeants, and these 24,900 men in only six large cities will be subject to investigation, arrest, prosecution, imprisonment, and fine by Federal officials.

We can imagine the chiefs of police of all the cities having read at roll call to these men the new Federal law providing, in certain contingencies, for a fine of $5,000, or five years in the penitentiary, or both.

When the national convention of chiefs of police meet in annual convention one of the reports will be upon national direction of municipal police departments by the United States Government.

This law would be a harvest for indemnity companies, because no private citizen will go on the bond of a constable, sheriff, or police officer who would come under the provisions of this law.

When Congressmen return home for the fall canvass and pay their respects to the sheriffs, constables, and prosecuting attorneys in the various counties in their districts how will they answer simple questions: Do you think I am straight? Do you think I am a coward? Do you think I will not do my duty? Why did you vote for a law that put me under Federal jurisdiction which threatens a fine and imprisonment?

Honest, brave, and efficient officers of the law in nearly every one of the 3,000 counties in the United States will demand answers to questions similar to these, and no satisfactory answer can be given.

THE BILL BY SECTIONS.

SECTION 1.

Section 1 provides that—

The phrase "mob or riotous assemblage," when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life, without authority of law, as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

Five persons is an ordinary automobile load of men, not a large or unusual assemblage or one that would attract extraordinary attention.

If five men, because they learned that some member of their family has been murdered, a female member of the family raped, a horse stolen, or some outrage perpetrated, for the purpose of revenge, kill the author of any one of these crimes, then the Federal law comes in, police officers may be fined and imprisoned, and a city or a county fined $10,000.

The law commences to operate when five men, as described in this section, come under its provisions.

If this designation of a mob does not place every peace officer—of whom there are approximately 150,000 in the United States—in jeopardy of fine and imprisonment, then the ordinary occurrences of recorded events in various portions of the United States which frequently occur are not truthfully chronicled.

SECTION 2.

Section 2 provides that—if any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails (1), neglects (2), or refuses (3) to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage (of five or more persons), such State shall, by reason of such failure, neglect, or refusal, be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the laws of the State, and, to the end that such protection as is guaranteed to the citizens of the United States by its Constitution may be secured, it is provided * * *.

This section is a strained attempt to bring this act under the fourteenth amendment, showing conclusively that the authors of the bill had read the amendment and were trying to circumvent it.

The absurdity of the attempt will be disclosed when the authorities construing the fourteenth amendment are discussed.

It will not be disputed that each State provides a penalty for murder for mob assemblage and mob violence, for failure to perform official duties, and for violation of the oath of office.

A mob of five persons does not herald its approach by posters or newspaper advertising or advance notice to peace officers.

A mob may assemble in such overwhelming numbers that it is impossible for one single officer, or even a number of officers, to protect a prisoner. Hundreds of brave officers and their assistants have lost their lives opposing the operations of mobs, and many citizens assisting them have sacrificed their lives and the lives of their associates that some criminal might be saved from death.

And yet, under this provision, if the officers of a State or any subdivision of a State, for the reason of failure, neglect, or refusal, does not stop the operation of this mob of five or more persons, then such State, county, or local subdivision shall be deemed to have denied to such person equal protection of the laws of the States.

Failure to protect such person placed in jeopardy may be due entirely to lack of knowledge; neglect may be due to a lack of notice, no opportunity for preparation, and an inadequate number of peace officials; and the question of refusal to act may depend upon one of a hundred circumstances. A refusal may save the lives of many people by sacrificing the life of one. Some judgment must be displayed, but no allowance is made under this section for any mitigating circumstance.

SECTION 3.

Section 3 provides that—any State or municipal officer charged with the duty or who possesses the power or authority as such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage, or who has any such person in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to prevent such person from being so put to death, or any State or municipal officer charged with the duty of apprehending or prosecuting any person participating in any such mob or riotous assemblage who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to perform his duty in apprehending or prosecuting to final judgment, under the laws of such State, all persons so participating, except such, if any, as are or have been held to answer for such participation in any district court of the United States, as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years or by a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

We are again confronted by the three different acts: First, who fails; second, who neglects; third, who refuses. And, strangely enough, this section not only makes the officer who is charged with the duty liable to fine and imprisonment, but any other person who possesses the power or authority of such officer may be fined and imprisoned.

The second paragraph of this section reads:

Any person who participates in a mob or riotous assemblage that takes from the custody or possession of any State or municipal officer any person held by such officer to answer for some actual or supposed public offense and puts such person to death as a punishment for such offense, or any person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage that obstructs or prevents any State or municipal officer in discharging his duty to apprehend, prosecute, protect, or punish any person suspected of or charged with any public offense, and puts such person to death as a punishment for such offense, shall be guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned for life or not less than five years.

Under the first half of this section any five persons acting in the manner described may place in jeopardy the constable, the marshal, or the sheriff of a county or the police officer of a municipality, and, after their incarceration, if the prosecuting attorney or circuit attorney fails, neglects, or refuses, according to the determination of a Federal official, to properly prosecute under the laws of the State, then such prosecuting attorney or circuit attorney is subject to a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment in a Federal penitentiary for five years.

If the mob should exceed 5 persons in number and become a crowd consisting of 100, 500, 1,000, or 5,000 persons, then it presents a different aspect which may go beyond the control of any local peace officer, constable, sheriff, or police department and require the presence of the State militia. This immediately draws in the governor of the State and the adjutant general in command of the State militia, and if for any reason the governor of the State does not move expeditiously or according to the preconceived ideas of his duty which the Federal officer may have, he may be charged with failure, neglect, or refusal, followed by his arrest by a United States marshal, his incarceration in jail, his prosecution by a Federal official before a Federal judge.

We would have the spectacle of the supreme executive of a sovereign Commonwealth arrested and tried in a Federal tribunal by a Federal jury, facing the possibility of a fine of $5,000 or sentence of five years in a Federal penitentiary.

If, in the opinion of the Federal official who is to decide this matter, the governor having done his part, his adjutant general or some colonel, or some captain serving under the adjutant general where such mob performs the act of violence, then such adjutant general, colonel, major, or captain may be indicted, imprisoned, and subjected to a trial which might result in a fine or imprisonment for five years.

In no argument presented on the floor of this House or in the hearings before Mr. VOLSTEAD'S committee have the proponents of this bill, in any printed statement, pointed out a single governor of a State, a single mayor of a great city, or the single head of a great police department who has not to the best of his ability performed his official duty in such emergencies in a satisfactory and conscientious manner.

This entire section is a wholesale assault upon the governors of 48 States, upon the attorneys general of 48 States, upon the adjutants general of 48 States, on the sheriffs representing 3,000 counties, upon the prosecuting attorneys and circuit attorneys representing over 3,000 political subdivisions.

It is a blanket indictment and gratuitous insult to conscientious State officials everywhere. It, in effect, causes all of these officials, elected by the people of their various communities, to give bond, a bond forfeiture meaning five years in the penitentiary or a $5,000 fine.

In the city of St. Louis we have a chief of police, 12 captains, 12 lieutenants, some hundreds of sergeants, and nearly 1,200 patrolmen.

From the chief of police to the last member of the police force this law means that they must yield a supervisory control to the Federal Government, and, in effect, give a bond to the Federal Government for the faithful performance of their duties, and then the tribunal to decide whether their duties have been faithfully performed is not State but Federal.

The latter portion of this section, which relates to the act of the private citizen and places him in jeopardy of imprisonment for not less than five years or for life, is for no crime committed against the National Government.

All such offenses are covered in State statutes, and this takes from the State the power of prosecution and transfers it to a Federal officer, who may reside in Washington, and makes a Federal offense of a State act.

The act committed is not interfering with a Federal officer, but is directed against a State officer, and the humiliating spectacle is here proposed that the punishment of a citizen of a State who interferes with, assaults, or takes a prisoner from a State officer shall not be punished by the authorities of his sovereign State, but his punishment is to be reserved for the Federal Government, which, by the farthest stretch of the imagination, has nothing to do with the creation of the office, the payment of the officer, the direction of his conduct, or anything directly governing his conduct in office.

This provision, in effect, says to each of the 48 States and their duly constituted governments, "You are not capable or competent to protect your peace officers in the discharge of their duties. You have been so negligent, careless, and inefficient in the past that the time has now come when Congress, understanding these matters better than the State understands them, has decided to afford your officers the protection of the Federal Government."

Insulting to the last degree, unjustified, and unconstitutional.

Nothing in this section relates to violation of a Federal statute or Federal law or the interference with a Federal officer carrying out a Federal mandate, but is exclusively confined to State officers performing State functions and proceeding under State mandate, and the determination of the whole matter is to be left not with a State tribunal or a Sate jury, but to a Federal tribunal and a Federal jury.

SECTION 4.

Section 4 provides that—any person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage, by which a person is put to death, shall be guilty of a felony and, on conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned for life or not less than five years.

This section subjects the private citizen of a State, who may be a member of a mob of five or a mob of 5,000, to trial and imprisonment for life, through the instrumentality exclusively of Federal agents, Federal judges, Federal prosecutors, and Federal detectives, and the citizen in this case has violated no Federal statute or committed any crime against the Federal Government, and in most States there is made ample provision for his punishment by death for this crime committed against the order of the State.

SECTION 5.

Now comes the most remarkable provision of all.

Section 5 reads:

That any county in which a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall forfeit $10,000, which sum may be recovered by an action therefor in the name of the United States against such county for the use of the family, if any, of the person so put to death; if he has no family, then to his dependent parents, if any; otherwise for the use of the United States. Such action should be brought and prosecuted by the district attorney of the United States of the district in which such county is situated in any court of the United States having jurisdiction therein. If such forfeiture is not paid upon recovery of a judgment therefor, such court shall have jurisdiction to enforce payment thereof by levy of execution upon any property of the county, or may compel the levy and collection of a tax therefor, or may otherwise compel payment thereof by mandamus or other appropriate process; and any officer of such county or other person who disobeys or fails to comply with any lawful order of the court in the premises shall be liable to punishment as for contempt and to any other penalty provided by law therefor.

Under this section, if five men commit murder under the circumstances described, then the Federal Government shall demand that the county in which this mob murder has taken place shall pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $10,000.

The United States attorney shall bring this action against such county or city, and upon the failure of a county or city to pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $10,000, then the United States court may levy a tax upon the property of the county and collect the money and put it into the United States Treasury, and if any officer of the county refuses to levy such tax, then he shall be put in jail for contempt.

It will be observed in this remarkable section that no palliating circumstance, no defense, no evidence, no mitigation, is provided by which a county can avoid the payment of such fine or the levy of taxes.

St. Louis, with nearly a million people, calmly sleeping in their beds, may wake up some morning and find that because five men have, without the knowledge of the officers of the law, killed another man in punishment of a crime, or because five men have overpowered a policeman or two policemen, and put a prisoner to death, then every man and woman in the city of St. Louis must be subjected to a fine, in their proportion of $10,000, in taxes.

And if these five men should kill five men in this manner, then for each of the five the city shall be fined an additional $10,000, or $50,000.

It does not matter how efficient the police force may be, how competent its officers, how numerous its personnel, all that is necessary is to establish the murder.

Three thousand counties in the United States, some of hundreds of miles in diameter, some sparsely settled, some with inadequate police protection, may find that in a distant portion of the county a mob composed of 5 men—or, for that matter, it may be 50 men—has murdered a suspected or actual criminal.

The city or county may have a competent, well organized, efficient, and capable police force, well paid, and of model capacity. The municipality or the county may have taken every possible precaution for the proper policing of the county or the city. This will be no defense. The mere fact that five men have committed such crime will subject the county or the city to a $10,000 fine without defense or recourse of any kind.

The Federal Government does not employ, pay, or manage the peace officers of either the city or the county, has nothing to do with their actions; and yet this bill provides for the fine of $10,000 without providing for any hearing from the county or municipality.

SECTION 6.

Section 6 reads as follows:

That in the event that any person so put to death shall have been transported by such mob or riotous assemblage from one county to another county during the time intervening between his capture and putting to death, each county in or through which he was so transported shall be jointly and severally liable to pay the forfeiture herein provided.

There are 3,000 counties in the United States, most all of which are composed of peaceful and law-abiding citizens.

A mob of five or more persons may assemble in one county, get into a machine with their prisoner, cross through other counties, and through every county they take their victim each of such counties shall be fined, and upon their refusal to pay a United States court shall levy taxes against the citizens of such counties.

What an absolute absurdity!

No defense is allowed the county, no palliating circumstance is to be considered. The mere passing through the county makes the county liable.

Of the 3,000 counties in the United States many are long and narrow, many have small sections abutting into other counties, and if any portion of any one of these sleeping counties of peaceful and law-abiding inhabitants is crossed over by a mob of five or more persons, then the men and women of such county shall pay to the United States Government $10,000 because they did not keep an armed force on the borders of the county night and day to prevent the passage of such mob of five or more persons.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

The proponents of this bill, supported by the chairman of the committee, Mr. VOLSTEAD, and a majority of the committee, although vigorously opposed in a minority report, and further opposed by able Republican members, base their entire contention for the constitutionality of this bill upon the fourteenth amendment, which provides:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

It will be seen that this amendment relates to the laws of a State, does not relate, nor was it intended to relate, to the individual action of a citizen, nor was it directed toward the malfeasance or nonfeasance of a State officer.

It has been construed so clearly and in such explicit language by the Supreme Court on a number of occasions that the authorities I shall quote are given merely for convenient reference.

The unconstitutionality of the bill has been ably argued by Members, and no one has successfully contradicted their position upon the matter of Supreme Court interpretation.

There is ample law now upon the State statute books to punish a mob or a person or persons who interfere with a State official in the discharge of his duty or who shall take from him a prisoner who is in his custody.

All of the rights and privileges of the United States officials are carefully covered in Federal statutes, and punishment is provided for any person who interferes with, hinders, or prevents the discharge of their duty.

The law under consideration does not relate to Federal officials or Federal prisoners, but applies exclusively and solely to State, county, and municipal officers, and relates to crimes committed against the statutes of the States, and not the statutes of the United States.

The fourteenth amendment means that no State, county, or municipality within a State should place upon its statute books an enactment which would—deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

No State in the Union has such law upon its statute books, and each State in the Union, on the contrary, provides in various statutes for the preservation of life, liberty, and property.

Nor is there a State in which there is an enactment which discriminates unjustly against any class of citizens.

Mob violence is a criminal offense in all States. Persons who form part of a mob which takes human life are guilty of murder. Penalties are provided for unlawful assemblage. Penalties are provided for interfering with an officer in the discharge of his duty or taking a prisoner from an officer. There is no State whose laws in this respect have been questioned by a single proponent of this bill.

The fourteenth amendment does not relate to the acts of individuals or the acts of official agents of a State where the acts of such agents were outside the pale of the law and not in conformity with the law of the Commonwealth. The fourteenth amendment deals directly with the State and the agencies of the State performing certain specific acts for the State.

Each State has laws prohibiting the commission of murder, theft, arson, rape, and a hundred other criminal offenses, and the peace officials of the State, the sheriff, the constable, and the police officers are instructed under their official oaths of office to arrest persons who violate these laws, and the prosecuting attorneys and circuit attorneys of the various counties take an official oath to uphold the law.

If the Federal Government assumes the right to punish an officer of a State for failure to prevent a crime, or a prosecuting attorney for failure to prosecute a crime, then the Federal Government can go into the business of prosecuting the chicken thief, the crap shooter, the card player, the drunkard, the wife beater, or the thief.

It was never intended that the fourteenth amendment should apply other than to the acts of States or the agents of States, in so far as they complied with the laws of the State. It is not the act of the official, or his omission to act, that is controlled by the fourteenth amendment, but it is the State law that controls the act and provides the things guaranteed in the fourteenth amendment.

United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S. Rep.), Chief Justice Waite:

The equality of the right of citizens is a principle of republicanism; every republican government is in duty bound to protect its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. This duty was originally assumed by the States and still remains there. The only obligation resting on the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. The amendment (fourteenth) guarantees this, but not more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of the guaranty.

United States v. Harris (106 West), Justice Wood:

If the fourteenth amendment is a guaranty against the acts of a State government itself, it is a guaranty against the exercise of arbitrary and unconstitutional power on the part of the government and legislation of the State, not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses; and the power of Congress, whether expressed or implied, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty, does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppression of crime within the States. The enforcement of the guaranty does not require or authorize Congress to perform the duty; that guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the State to perform.

The Civil Rights cases, Justice Bradley:

It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation, but to provide against State legislation and State action of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights, but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws.

Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313):

These provisions of the fourteenth amendment have reference to State action exclusively, and not to any action of private individuals.

The Slaughterhouse case (16 U. S. (Wall.) 81), Chief Justice Miller:

The existence of laws in the States where the newly-emancipated Negroes resided, which discriminated in gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this class, and by such laws are forbidden.

The Civil Rights cases, United States v. Stanley, Ryan, et al. (109 U. S., 11):

It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of this amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of any kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the laws. * * *

This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation, but to provide modes of relief against State legislation or State action of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights, but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws and the action of State officers, executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment.

Positive rights and privileges are undoubtedly secured by the fourteenth amendment, but they are secured by way of prohibition against State laws and State proceedings affecting those rights and privileges, and by power given to Congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect, and such legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed State laws or State proceedings and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect.

The One hundred and thirteenth United States, at page 27, Justice Field:

But neither the amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people.

It seems unnecessary to add to these authorities. They are so plain and understandable that there can be no dispute that all of the interpretations of the fourteenth amendment delivered by the Supreme Court in every case presented to it are uniform, clear, and explicit in defining the meaning of this amendment.

Driven from the opinions delivered by the eminent justices of the Supreme Court to look elsewhere for some authority which would sustain their contention of validity, the proponents of this bill try to find an analogy between the Volstead law, where the Nation enforces the prohibition of the sale and manufacture of liquor, and this attempt to have the Federal Government punish the crime of murder committed by a mob.

Unfortunately for this contention, the authority of the Federal Government in prohibition is specifically set out in the eighteenth amendment, which shows clearly that without another amendment of the Constitution expressly authorizing the Federal Government to take cognizance of homicides committed by a State mob, there is no provision at the present time for such action.

THE REAL MOTIVE.

On January 10 a really great and brave speech was delivered in the House in opposition to this bill by IRA G. HERSEY, a Republican Member from Maine.

Mr. HERSEY served two terms in the legislature, two terms in the State senate, of which he was president.

He was a Member of the Sixty-fifth, Sixty-sixth, and Sixty-seventh Congresses.

He is a lawyer of distinguished ability, and is a member of the Judiciary Committee, which reported this bill.

It required courage of the highest order for a Republican Member to tell the truth about this measure and to disclose the real motive which forced its introduction.

His speech will be gratefully remembered and appreciated by the advocates of constitutional government and those citizens who place public welfare above partisan necessity. Mr. HERSEY said:

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], who represents a large Negro voting population in the city of St. Louis, immediately at the opening of this Congress introduced, not a resolution authorizing the creation of a commission representing both races to study and report on the entire subject as recommended by the President, but he introduced the bill under consideration with this misleading title, "A bill to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws and to punish the crime of lynching."

The Southwestern Christian Advocate, the organ of certain societies formed to stir up race hatred and race prejudice, under date of December 29 advocates the passage of the Dyer bill by the Republicans of this House as a bill to pay the debts of the Republican Party. It says:

"Let it be said that if the party's debt to the Negro can be cancelled by consummating this vast moral reform, which means so much for the future perpetuity of the Nation, the bargain would be legitimate and the Negro welcomes the deal."

Of course, the Negro welcomes the "deal." Under the false statements of certain agitators, who are working to bring about race riots, the Negro will welcome the "deal."

To assist the commission on the question of the constitutionality of the provisions of this bill we called before us the Attorney General of the United States. He sent his assistant, Mr. Goff, an able lawyer and one well qualified to advise the committee. In the course of his testimony, as set forth in the hearings, it seemed to me that the Attorney General's office considered itself in duty bound to support and recommend this bill as a party measure and advise its passage, because it was claimed by its author that it was so pledged by the Republican platform and recommended to Congress by the President.

In other words, the Assistant Attorney General argued his case for the proponents of the bill with all the skill and ingenuity of a paid attorney representing a certain client's interests. Every decision and authority cited was so arranged, colored, and quoted as to make out a prima facie case for the bill and to advise the committee, in substance, that even if its constitutionality was in doubt, it ought to be put up to the Supreme Court. In other words, that Congress should pass its responsibility on to the United States Supreme Court. In the hearings there is a letter from the Hon. Moorfield Storey, of Massachusetts, who is attorney for an organization of agitators known as the National Association for Advancement of Colored People, which has its headquarters in New York City, an organization whose work is to stir up the race question in the South and to induce the ignorant Negroes to believe that they are the victims of imaginary wrongs at the hands of the whites and that Congress can stop all lynchings.

Mr. Storey seems to voice the sentiment of the proponents of this bill, first, that they are very doubtful of its constitutionality; second, it is therefore the duty of Congress to enact it and pass it on to the courts. I can understand the zeal of those who view this bill from the standpoint of political expediency. They say in so many words, "This Republican Congress can satisfy the colored people of the South by the enactment of this legislation. If the Supreme Court declares it unconstitutional, which it doubtless will, if enacted, then the colored voters will have nobody to blame but the Supreme Court, and as the judges of that court are appointed for life and do not, like Representatives, come up every two years to be elected, they can suffer no harm, and the party will discharge its responsibility and in another way have taken care of the recommendation of the President."

* * * * * * *

* * * I have carefully, seriously, and thoroughly investigated this legislation, and without any doubts I have arrived at the conclusion that this bill, if enacted, would violate the Constitution of the United States, and if it should possibly be held legal and constitutional by the Supreme Court of the land, then its effect upon the Nation as a whole would be most unfortunate and disastrous to peace and good order in the Nation, and as a law it would be necessarily vicious legislation, unwise, unenforceable, and unworkable.

There was not a word of evidence before our committee that any State of the Union had denied to any person the equal protection of the laws. There was no evidence that any State in the Union had enacted laws or had now upon its statute books any laws discriminating against any person, or had denied by its provisions to any person or class of persons the equal protection of the laws.

On page 43 of the hearings Assistant Attorney General Goff states:

"If the Congress of the United States, in view of the fact that a State has a law punishing murder, says there should be a Federal law punishing murder in order that there may be conceded to the people of that State an equal, vigorous, and speedy enforcement of the law and the protection of their lives and their property, then Congress would have the right, in the exercise of the correlative duty of protection, to do so."

My colleague from Nebraska on the committee [Mr. REAVIS] asks Mr. Goff (p. 43):

"Would you carry that further, to burglary, larceny, and assault and battery?

"Mr. GOFF. Of course, the principle would carry us there."

Yes; of course "the principle would carry us there." Reason and logic carry us there. Our own common sense tells us that there is no escape from the absurd position in which the Congress would be placed if we should pass this bill. If we can enact a code of Federal law to punish the crime of lynching, we can pass a code of Federal criminal law for all the States to punish every offense now within the jurisdiction of State courts. We could send a host of new Federal judges into every State to replace the State courts. We could infest every State with a swarm of Federal officers to punish every crime known to the law, and the States of the Union would have left no rights that politicians in Congress would be bound to respect.

Thanks for the courage of HERSEY and men like him in the House. Thanks for the hope which comes that the Senate will honor the law, respect tradition, and not barter liberty for votes.

Will the time-honored sovereignty of 48 States be placed in jeopardy to pay political debts and established principles of law be abandoned to hold a racial vote? Will the governors of 48 States and 150,000 peace officers be insulted and their administration questioned by placing them under Federal control simply to please a political propaganda?

The unfortunate Negro this time has been promised not "40 acres and a mule" but a mutilated Constitution for his delectation and consolation.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the crime of lynching is one of the most regrettable crimes committed in this country.

The Federal Government has its responsibility in seeing that no State deny to American citizens the equal protection of laws. When a mob in its rabid violence refuses one of our citizens the right to the usual trial guaranteed to all it can not be claimed that such person is given the equal protection of laws. What an alarming situation is presented when we find that in some States more lives are taken four or five times over by lynching than by the methods of execution known to the law.

Our Constitution recognizes the black man as an American citizen and when one is guilty of a crime he should be tried in the orderly way provided by law. But the mob may and sometimes does wreak its vengeance upon the innocent as well as the guilty. What picture violates our sense of justice more than an innocent Negro suspected of a crime in the hands of the mob which knows no justice or reason? And it is this innocent man who is to be the beneficiary of this wise legislation. The courts can deal with the guilty and spare the innocent. White or black, every person is entitled to a fair trial.

The Republican platform made this specific promise:

We urge Congress to consider the most effective means to end lynching in this country, which continues to be a terrible blot on our American civilization.

The Dyer bill will not only carry out this promise, made not to the colored men and women alone but to all the American electorate. The colored soldier who fought for his country is entitled to have a country which gives to his race the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know since my short service in the House when we have had a measure before the House which has brought forth so much argument upon the ground that the measure is unconstitutional. It is quite remarkable that this should occur when the measure before us undertakes to enforce the Constitution. The gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House charge that the party in power is undertaking to carry out its party platform in the enactment of this law. It may be that this measure is carrying out the party platform. The Republican Party usually does that. One thing is sure, if that is an offense the party represented by gentlemen on the other side would never be charged with the offense.

This measure, of course, is one in which we naturally wonder whether we have the power to deal with it as Representatives in Congress, which has only the power that has been delegated to it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] stated very frankly that he thought a certain part of this bill was probably constitutional, and yet he dealt through the entire length of his argument with the phases of the bill which he thought were unconstitutional. I want to say to my colleagues that I have given very careful study to this bill, and I think even those who entertained the opinion that we have not the constitutional power to deal with individuals are entirely justified in finding within the four corners of the measure constitutional provisions that can not be questioned, and although it may be necessary to amend certain sections of the measure which undertake to reach individuals, irrespective of the action of the State, yet it is our duty, if we believe that we are acting within our constitutional powers with the great substance of the measure, to write it upon the statute books and at the same time to amend those sections so that they will be held constitutional and enforced even if some other section of the bill should not be constitutional.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I can not.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I know the gentleman did, but the gentleman talked for 2 hours, and I am talking for only 10 minutes. I frankly say that with much of his argument with reference to section 4 I am in thorough accord, but I have no doubt that the gentleman is just as thoroughly in accord with the proposition that I am advancing, that so far as this law reaches out and deals with State officers, with agencies of the State, it is absolutely within our power, and the question of whether we should do it is entirely one of whether it is wise to do it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I regret that I can not, and I hope the gentleman will not think that I am discourteous to him.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not think that, but the gentleman is misstating my position.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If I have misstated the gentleman's position, I withdraw any statement I have made, but an examination of the gentleman's speech which is in the RECORD will show that he did not claim that all of this statute was unconstitutional. That is my opinion about it. If I am mistaken I shall be glad to have anyone refer to the speech and put an accurate statement with respect to his position in the RECORD.

It is said that we must not interfere with the sovereign powers of the States. Why, gentlemen of the House, that is the claim that is made whenever the United States Government undertakes to exercise its powers. When we are given by the Constitution of the United States in the fourteenth amendment an obligation to enact necessary legislation to see that the State does not deny equal protection of the laws to the citizens of the United States, it seems to me that it is the height of absurdity for anyone to claim that the law we are enacting does affect the State in its activities and does not leave it with its sovereign power. The very subject with which we are dealing is the failure of the State to give due protection of the law, and is it to be supposed that the law which has that for that purpose will leave the State in absolutely free sway and affect none of the officers of the State? Gentlemen are worried because the Federal Government reaches out and touches the State officers. That is done every day within Federal jurisdiction. I remember during my law practice when a certain city editor was served with notice that he was guilty of indirect contempt. Within an hour and a half from the time he was served with that notice he was sentenced to 10 days in jail. He employed me, but I had no chance within the hour and a half to file a verified answer, which is required under our State statutes.

The night he was placed in jail I sat up until 3 o'clock in the morning, and, with my cocounsel, prepared a petition for a writ of habeas corpus and went to the Federal court and advanced the argument to Judge Anderson, the judge of that court, that my client was deprived of his liberty without due process of law; that, although he was in jail by the judgment of the State court, yet under all of the facts he had not been given due process of law. The Federal arm of the Government reached out and the United States marshal went down with a writ of habeas corpus and brought that State officer before the Federal tribunal, and the court said that certainly it could not be claimed that a man who was given an hour and a half to make his defense where the State law requires a verified answer had been given due process of law, and turned him loose.

Nobody claimed, who knew anything about law, that it was not proper for the Federal Government in that case to act where one of the citizens of the United States was not given his right under the Constitution, that it was an improper thing, because it interfered with the sheriff, and not only interfered with him but released his prisoner.

The decisions are that whenever the State clothes its officer with power and commission of authority that that officer's general acts are the acts of the State, just as much the act of a State as the act of an employee is the act of an employer, although it might not be ratified by the employer at all. If a conductor of a street railway company ejects a passenger without any ground for ejecting him, he is not acting as his employer would have him act and not acting according to the rules, yet no one would claim that, acting thus, he would not be acting for the employer. We must speedily enact this law and protect our own citizens in their rights under our Constitution. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I thank the chairman of the committee for yielding me 10 minutes. This antilynching bill was reported to the House from the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I have the honor of being a member. That committee considered this bill for several weeks. I shall have no hesitancy in supporting the bill. This legislation is sound in principle and, in my judgment, is constitutional. It is to be expected that several unimportant changes will be made in its provisions before the final vote is had, but in principle the bill should remain as it now is. The Judiciary Committee was favored with the views of Attorney General Daugherty and Assistant Attorney General Goff, both of whom contended for the constitutionality of the bill. I find ample warrant for its constitutionality in the opinions rendered by these gentlemen. I have listened during these many hours of debate to the contentions of our constitutional lawyers and have not yet found any justification for abandoning the reasoning of the Attorney General. Having known the present Attorney General personally for many years, and having a profound admiration for his legal attainments, I am pleased to follow his opinion regarding this legislation.

Ours is the only civilized country which bears this national disgrace of lynching. In no other country do we find its parallel. It is condemned by all. The last Republican platform said:

> We urge Congress to consider the most effective means to end lynching in this country, which continues to be a terrible blot on our American civilization.

President Harding, in his first message to Congress, said:

> Congress ought to wipe the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly representative democracy.

Ex-President Wilson, in 1918 in an appeal to the American people to stop lynching, said:

> I therefore very earnestly and solemnly beg that the governors of all the States, the law officers of every community, and, above all, the men and women of every community in the United States, all who revere America and wish to keep her name without stain or reproach, will cooperate, not passively merely, but actively and watchfully, to make an end of this disgraceful evil. It can not live where the community does not countenance it.

A Democratic Attorney General in 1918 said:

> Lynch law is the most cowardly of crimes. Invariably the victim is unarmed, while the men who lynch are armed and large in numbers.

From the report we learn that during the 30 years ending with 1918, 3,224 persons were lynched, of whom 2,522 were Negroes, and of these 50 were women. Georgia led with 386; yet in Georgia Negroes paid taxes on 1,664,368 acres of land. Of the colored victims, only 19 per cent were accused of rape. In the year 1919, 77 Negroes, 4 whites, and 2 Mexicans were lynched. Ten of the Negroes were ex-soldiers; one was a woman. During 1920 there were 65 persons lynched; 6 were white and 59 were Negroes. The Tuskegee Institute submits figures showing that during the year 1921 there were 63 lynched—1 in a Northern State and 62 in Southern States. Less than one-third of them were charged with rape. It is significant that during a 30-year period less than one-third of those lynched were charged with the crime of rape. These figures are simply appalling and give some idea of the enormity of this blotch on our American civilization.

It is generally conceded that our lack of respect for law and order constitutes the greatest danger existing in our country to-day. Laws exist for the trial of these unfortunates, yet they are deprived of life itself, with no opportunity to prove their innocence. While this debate has been in progress Negroes have been lynched and two burned to death, and not one of them has been granted his constitutional right to a fair and impartial trial—granted no trial whatever. I submit that under the American spirit of fair play the colored man should not be charged with the equal burdens and equal responsibilities of citizenship in the time of war and at the same time denied his guaranty of an equal protection of the laws. The governors of several Southern States not only deplore this condition which so generally exists, but have called upon their legislatures for more stringent action. The good women of Atlanta have petitioned for reform. The question of social equality is not involved, but the question of equal rights under our laws is at stake. If these States are unable to guarantee such persons fair trials, then the Federal Government should intervene under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment, since the States have then denied to their citizens the equal protection of the law.
